Mr. LOGAN. I see the name of this post is enumerated with the others there, and if the Senator from Louisiana or the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands had called my attention to it it would probably have saved the trouble which has arisen. My attention was not called to it, and the fact is that I tried, as chairman of the Military Committee, to get information from the Secretary of War in reference to one reservation, and he referred me to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior referred me back to the Secretary of War. I have both their letters on file. Neither one offered to furnish me a list of these reservations, and that led me into the error that I fell into. Of course I have no objection under the law to the bill going to the Committee on Public Lands, but it would have been at least fair, I think, that my attention had been called to this, inasmuch as the list had not been furnished to the Committee on Military Affairs by the Secretary of War, which certainly should have been done. At least when I asked for the information and was referred to the Secretary of the Interior and by him was referred back to the Secretary of War, it seems to me it would have been but fair to have furnished that list to the committee.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB. I think we have the information now.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I have modified the resolution, and ask that it be read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified by the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War make to the Senate a report showing fully all the military reservations transferred to the Interior Department as abandoned and useless under the law of July 5, 1884, and the dates of such transfers, and also all military reservations transferred to the Interior Department under any previous law or other authority since July 1, 1865, with dates of such transfers.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a number of others that have been transferred under the authority of special laws. We had better have a list of them, so that we may not make any mistake.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] moves that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill named by him, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the treasurer of the Washington Gas-light Company is hereby required to furnish to the Senate a statement of the amount of the capital stock of the said company, and a statement of every dividend which has been declared by the said company, whether the same has been made in shares, scrip, or cash, or in any other manner whatsoever, since January 1, 1881, and that such statement shall include an account of the money, or securities or property in which money may have been invested, and all cash resources or assets on hand or held by the said company at the present time.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that that be amended so that he be required not only to give the date of the dividends but the amount of the same respectively.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Insert the words "amount and date" at the proper place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please put the amendment in writing.

Mr. VAN WYCK reduced the amendment to writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, after the word "dividend," it is proposed to insert "including date and amount;" so as to read:

That the treasurer of the Washington Gas-light Company is hereby required to furnish to the Senate a statement of the amount of the capital stock of the said company, and a statement of every dividend, including date and amount, which has been declared by the said company, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification suggested by the Senator from Nebraska will be made. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

BASIS OF BANK CIRCULATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is now in order.

Mr. BOWEN. I intended to ask the Senate to hear me this morning, as indicated by my suggestion on Monday last that I would ask to be heard on the bill (S. 1594) providing for a new basis for the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, now lying on the table. I give notice now that I shall ask to be heard on it immediately after the final disposition of the education bill. That bill is now so nearly finished that I shall not interfere with it.

BONDS HELD BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate how many of the bonds called for payment April 1 are held by national banks.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That each Senator shall report to the Senate on Monday next the name of his private secretary.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution, and I have reasons for asking it.

Mr. PLATT. As a great many Senators have not any private secretary, it seems to me that resolution, if it is to be considered, ought to be modified, to say the least.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the Senator object to its consideration? I do not hear him.

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better lie over.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want simply to remark, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. PLATT. I have no private secretary, and I do not want to be obliged to report.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Neither have I. I want simply to remark——

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to remark, as a reason for offering the resolution, that the last Congress voted to pay private secretaries to Senators, and I am acquainted with the fact that tickets are issued to men to come upon this floor who would not be admitted into the parlors of gentlemen acquainted with them as I am, and yet they have tickets of admission as private secretaries to Senators. That is one of the subjects that I want discussed before the Senate, and possibly I may state some things with which some of the gentlemen on this floor are not acquainted.

Mr. PLATT. I will not object to the resolution. The only objection that I wished to make to it was that it required every Senator to report the name of his private secretary, and I thought it implied that all Senators had private secretaries.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; I do not understand that. A Senator has the right to employ as many private secretaries as he shall please to pay for. We know also that there are private secretaries under the pay of the Government. We know also that Senators on this floor have their private secretaries and issue their cards to those who receive no pay except that of admission to this floor to black-mail gentlemen, to libel them in their newspapers. That is what I want to have disclosed and discussed here. I want to know whether a man who is capable of libeling a Senator shall have a ticket of admission to this floor; and that is the reason I have for the introduction of this resolution. I do know of such a case and I know of its existence here.

Only this morning we read in the RECORD of what occurred in the House of Representatives because Eads was on the floor of that House. Would it be permissible for me to intimate that while Eads was not on this floor, he has three henchmen here, two of them representing Republican journals and one a Democratic journal, coming to get information, to libel Senators on this floor whenever they can get their type and presses to work, and coming here as the private secretaries of Senators, receiving no pay for it except getting tickets of admission as private secretary from a Senator, who, for instance, has his own son for his private secretary, drawing pay, and the other, no, the creature—I will not say the other, but the creature—coming here with a ticket of admission as a private secretary. That is the reason I have offered the resolution, and I will press it until it shall be known where this thing was evolved from and who has done it.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LOSSES OF OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the adoption of the following resolution——

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to call up the education bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is morning business, and we are in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War make to the Senate a report showing the actual proceedings had to date under the act of March 3, 1885, including the claims in full as presented and recommended for allowance, and any difference in views between the officers of the War and Treasury Departments in regard to the same.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not have time to write the title of the act, but it is the law authorizing the War Department to receive, adjust, and report upon claims for losses by fire, &c., of officers and soldiers. We must have for the information of the Senate, in order to enable us to understand and legislate further if necessary, what action the War Department has already taken under it, and we should also like to know the items of the accounts of such claims and what the officers have allowed as actually necessary and proper, and any differences that may exist between the officers of the War Department and the Treasury Department in regard to what is proper under the law.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the passage of the resolution just passed on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. I wish to say that that resolution requires each Senator to make a report to the Senate on Monday morning next. It will, I suppose, require every Senator to rise in his place. I should like to move to amend the resolution by filing the names with the Secretary of the Senate, to be printed in the RECORD. I will move that amendment, and then ask that the matter stand till the Senator from Virginia comes in. He is not present now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to? The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution adopted on the motion of Mr. RIDDLEBERGER.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see the Senator who introduced the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I stated that I should move an amendment and let it stand until the Senator came in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it would be as well not to reconsider it in the absence of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. I will let the motion to reconsider stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered. The morning business is now concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the educational bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now call up the motion to reconsider the resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. I have the assent of that Senator to the reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution was passed:

Resolved, That each Senator shall report to the Senate on Monday next the name of his private secretary.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to amend by adding:

By filing the same with the Secretary of the Senate, to be published in the RECORD.

Mr. CALL. The resolution has been reconsidered I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been and it is now open to amendment.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that the name of every Senator's private secretary is already in the Secretary's office, obliged to be there, and to my knowledge is there at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SARAH B. JACKSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BLAIR. For what purpose?

Mr. VAN WYCK. In the Forty-eighth Congress, the Senator will remember, a bill was passed by the House of Representatives, a special pension bill, for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson. It was examined in the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, and the report of the House committee concurred in, and a recommendation made that the bill should be passed. When the bill came up, however, an amendment was proposed in the Senate incorporating the same features as have been lately passed in the House bill increasing the pensions of widows and dependent relatives. At the time it was suggested in the Senate that that amendment, though proper in itself, might imperil the passage of the bill, not from counteraction on the part of the House, but possibly because of what might be necessary delay. But assurance was given at the time that if the amendment should be likely to cause delay and prevent the passage of the bill in the House the bill would be recalled and the amendment withdrawn, so that the bill might pass pure and simple.

The amendment was put upon the bill by the Senate and went to the House, and although there was ample time to have passed it, yet the House considered it of more importance, it would seem, to refuse action upon a legislative matter by reason of a controversy growing up there in regard to a contested-election case. This morning the same bill is reported to us passed upon by the House, and I desire to have it put on its passage; and in this connection, as a part of the current history of pensions, I should like to make just one suggestion. I see in the discussion in the House yesterday——

Mr. INGALLS. That will not do.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I see from a statement which I have read in a paper that it has been stated that the Senate should have before this time enacted a law increasing the rate of pensions to widows and dependent relatives. I desire to throw back any imputation of that kind, because it appears by the history of this bill that more than a year ago the Senate did introduce and did pass the very same proposition which a few days ago was passed in the House; and not content with that, the Senate was arraigned because long ago it did not itself, a Republican body, pass a pension bill of that nature. It is proper to make the suggestion now that not only a year ago was a bill incorporating the same provision introduced but it actually passed in the Senate; but it so happened that that measure was passed as an amendment to the House bill for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, and if the House had paused in the discharge of its duties a few minutes it could have enacted it into a law a year ago. If that had been done, the widows and dependent relatives for the last year would have been drawing an increased pension. Therefore it is that this bill was passed on unanimously by the committee and substantially unanimously by the Senate. I ask now that it may be placed on its passage, because on that bill was put the amendment to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. BLAIR. I will consent that the consideration of the school bill shall be laid aside informally with the right to call for it as the special order if this leads to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions. Does the Senator from Nebraska now report it?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir. I report from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, without amendment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah B. Jackson, widow of William B. Jackson, late of Company A, Ninety-first Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], upon which question the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I said yesterday, it is not my purpose to enter upon a general discussion of this bill. It is unusual legislation. It is suggested and defended upon the ground that in some of the States of the Union there is a dangerous degree of illiteracy. It is agreed on all hands that the great bulk of that illiteracy is found in the colored race of the South, a race that recently came out of a condition of slavery.

The fact that this race was so long held under slavery, a condition of which ignorance was an incident, appeals strongly to the philanthropy and patriotism of the people of all the States to assist in relieving it from that weight of inherited ignorance. It is agreed that in all the old free States the people have both the ability and the disposition to provide for every child of school age a suitable common-school education. If all the States were now in the condition in which the free States are such legislation as this could not be justified.

It was understood then in framing this legislation that it should be so framed that the bulk of the money would go to the Southern States. It was not thought best to make an arbitrary assignment of so much to each State. At the last Congress it was concluded that it was not best to put this apportionment upon a basis, suggested I believe by myself, that its distribution should be limited to those States that had 10 per cent. or more of illiteracy in their population.

The committee and those who were friendly to this measure therefore sought some general expression as to the division which would accomplish the purpose of giving the larger part of this donation to the Southern States, and yet would seem to be general in its application. After much discussion the basis of this bill was agreed upon, that this fund should be distributed to the States in the proportion that the illiterates in the several States over ten years of age bore to the whole number of such illiterates in the United States. Mr. President, no one supposed that this would be a just basis of distribution in the State to the respective school districts. It was not suggested as a just basis for such distribution. It was suggested wholly for the purpose which I have mentioned.

Now, sir, for one I do not believe in making this legislation a subject of jugglery. I do not believe that we should attempt any tricks for political advantage. I do not believe that we should so legislate as to hold out to our colored friends in the South a promise of substantial aid in the way of education and yet cumber the bill with such unjust limitations as will make its defeat certain, or if it should ever become a law that its kindly execution in the States would be impossible. If we are unfriendly to this general system let us frankly and openly say so, let us kill this bill in an open way; but I object to any suggestion that shall tend to so cumber the bill with conditions as that its kindly and efficient operation in the States shall be absolutely prevented.

Mr. President, I am one of those who feel that the colored race in the South since the war has been subjected to indignities, cruelties, outrages, and a repression of rights such as find no parallel in the history of civilization. I have read with horror the authenticated stories of the cruelties which have been visited upon this docile, kindly, and inoffensive race. I have looked hopefully in the old times to the forcible intervention of the General Government in their defense. I have thought that it might be possible under that stringent legislation which Congress adopted, by the forcible intervention of the Federal authority to protect them in those rights of which they were so cruelly deprived. But I have ceased to have faith in the possibility of that intervention in their behalf, constituted as this Government is with its complex organization of Federal and State Governments, independent within certain limitations. In the States and in the tribunals which they establish and in the venue where the offenses are committed, crimes against the colored people must be tried. Of necessity the successful vindication of the rights of these people fails unless there is a sentiment in the locality where the offenses are to be examined into and punished that reprobates and condemns them.

Mr. President, for one I believe there exists to-day in the Southern States a condition of things that sadly needs to be remedied. I do not see how it can be remedied by the intervention of the Federal authority. I look to two great agencies alone to elevate the colored race to an equality with their white brethren who dwell with them, to secure them in their just rights and to equip them properly, as we must admit they have not hitherto been equipped, to understand the duties of citizenship and to discharge those duties intelligently; I look to two great agencies—the force of public opinion and education within the States. I believe there are no other efficient agencies. I believe the only method by which the colored man can be led up to a manhood which will claim and which will not be denied full and equal rights as a citizen in all the Southern States is this process of education.

Holding these views, Mr. President, I am sincerely solicitous that Federal aid shall be extended to the States in such a way that the kindly impulses of that increasing body of Southern men who show a kindly disposition toward the elevation of the colored man shall be recognized and encouraged.

In attempting to extend this aid there were just two methods open to us. One was to have the general Government administer its own fund in the States, that is, to set up a Federal system of common schools in the States, to appoint the teachers and superintendents, and pay them; and to bring into those schools the colored population of the States. But this process is not now advocated by any one here. I do not think there is a Senator on either side of this Chamber who suggests that course as a solution of this trouble.

Then what was the other method? That we should use the State governments and the institutions which they have established and the officers they have selected as the instrumentalities for the distribution and application of this gift from the General Government. It is agreed, I believe, on all hands that that is the course we must pursue. It is the most promising course. It is a course that makes these Southern States and their officers the instruments of this work that brings them into kindly relations with the race that is to be educated, that stimulates and suggests and promotes the best impulses of their own heart and is calculated to develop a like kindly feeling in the race in whose behalf their efforts are expended.

These things settled, that we are to use the States as the agency of this distribution, what follows? The fundamental mistake that has run through the arguments of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine is this: They speak of this question as if we were dealing alone with that fund which is contributed by the General Government. That is the error. All of their arguments are upon the idea that we are simply dealing with our own fund and directing its application. That is a mistake. By the conditions of this bill imposed upon the States we deal with the State revenue; we say, "You shall have no benefit of this bill unless you do thus and so with your own revenue."

I agree, if we were dealing simply with our own fund, and if we were leaving the States perfectly free to deal with theirs as they chose, then it is a matter entirely within our own discretion as to how we will have this fund expended. But why have we dealt or assumed to deal with State school funds and taxes by imposing conditions upon their use? Simply because we desire not to make this an independent system, but to ingraft it upon or rather to use it as a stimulus to the school systems of the several States. We say to every State that gets the benefit of it, "you shall distribute the fund you raise for education equally without any discrimination between the white and black children of your State who are of school age." That is the limitation we put upon them. That is asserted in the bill over and over again. I happen to know with what carefulness and with what pains and after what consultations these stringent provisions were inserted in this bill. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me, we require a system that shall offer school advantages to all the children, and that shall offer those advantages equally to every child without reference to race or color.

When we require that of a State, have we not solemnly declared that that is the true basis upon which to put education in the State? If that confession is not involved, why that requirement? I say it is our proclamation that the ideal school system, the ideal and perfect relation between the white and black races of the South is to be sought and is to be attained when every man, black and white, is secured in the full and equal enjoyment of equal civil rights, and as to education when every child, black and white, of the school age is secured equal privileges in the common schools of the State. These provisions are our declaration that that is the ideal and perfect relation of the races; and it is. Who will ask more?

Mr. President, I have been always the friend of the colored man. I have received him into my camp when a fugitive from his master he sought liberty under the flag; I have fed him; and in a very humble way under the greater instrumentalities that were over me and under God, whose guiding hand was over all, have in small measure contributed to his emancipation; and no one anywhere rejoiced in it more than I. I have seen some illustrations of his hungering for education that touched my heart deeply and filled my eyes with tears. In the camps of the war I have seen an aged colored man who had fled from slavery to the safe refuge of a Union camp who had toiled all day in the employment to which he was assigned, and when the camp was left in silence and soldiers slept, when only the tread of the sentinel broke the stillness of the night, I have seen that poor colored man past three-score prone upon the ground with his head toward a camp-fire and the spelling-book that he had gotten from the chaplain before him, toilsomely learning the lessons of childhood. I know his eagerness to be taught; and his need is too serious and too important a question to be the subject of legislative jugglery.

Now, Mr. President, having admitted by the bill that this condition of equality which the bill requires as a condition before the State can receive any benefit in the ideal condition, shall we incorporate in this bill any amendment that disturbs that condition and that equality? That is the question which is presented by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, what I desire is that we shall guard the original distribution of the fund by the most stringent provisions possible, that we shall not allow any State to touch a dollar of it that has not by constitution or statutory law provided a system broad enough and wide enough to take into it every colored and white child in the State; and if there is trouble there let us remedy it. If the bill is not strict enough there, let us make it strict; but let us not because we doubt the sufficient stringency of the bill upon that question incorporate in it something that disturbs and overturns this whole basis of equality between the races in the distribution of the school fund.

Mr. President, when we say to the State "you shall thus equally, per capita"—for that is what it amounts to—"distribute your revenue among the children of the State of school age without reference to race or color," we come under a most solemn obligation to use ours in the same way.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa provides, as every one who reads it knows, for an unequal distribution. It does not go upon the per capita basis, and the result of it is that after requiring the State to give each colored child his equal share of the State fund, we then deny to the white child an equal share of our donation.

If I understand the effect of the amendment—and I do not think I can be mistaken, for I have given it careful thought—the result of it is this: We require the State of Mississippi in all the school fund it raises to give to every colored child there the same advantages, the same per capita distribution of its school fund, that it gives to a white child. Now we come in, having thus limited the power of the State to make any discrimination, and we divide this fund in such a way that the per capita allowance of the colored child in the State is largely increased above that of the white child. I do not think any Senator who reads this will deny that that is the effect of the amendment as it stands.

In other words, if the State distributes $1 per capita for school purposes to every child of school age in the State, we require that every colored child shall get his dollar. Then we come in and make a distribution of say $3 per capita out of the national Treasury, and we give $2 of it to the colored child, giving him $3, and $1 of it to the other, giving him $2. If that is not the effect of it, I can not understand language. I want to know if any man who is a real friend of the colored race; I want to know if any of those educated colored men who are at the head of the normal schools at the South, or who are teaching in other schools, who are here in the city of Washington engaged in educational work, or any of those educated colored men who are preaching the Gospel to their fellows, familiar with the wants, desires, and expressions of their race—I want to know if any man of them has ever been found anywhere to ask for the colored people of the South larger educational advantages than are given to the whites.

God knows I would be glad to see anything done that is for the true interest of the colored race in the South; but I can not believe that to so distribute this fund as to keep the colored schools open six months in the year and at the same time so limit the power of the State to make any additional provision for white schools as to require them to close at the end of four months is in the interest of the colored race. I do not believe there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who represents a State that would consent to such a school system.

Now what I desire is that this appropriation shall so go to the States that every child, taking what the State gives and what the Government gives, shall have a fair, equal, even chance for an education. That is what the colored people demand, and that is what their friends ask for them. To give them less than this is injustice; to give them more than this is fatal.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, it seems to me, is fatally defective, even to accomplish the purpose which he intends. Let me read it:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

One trouble in dealing with this question is the variety of legislation which we have in the States, and which we call school systems. Some of them are very inappropriately called systems; but every practical man will admit that the distribution of the school revenue must be made at the beginning of the year. If the State of Indiana has $1,000,000 to use for common-school purposes the distribution or assignment of that fund for the year must be made at the beginning of the year. We can not dole it out without a system. We must understand at the beginning how much each school district is to get at least.

Now it may be and probably is true that in many of the Southern States there are no school districts. They deal with schools rather than with school districts. So if I understand this amendment aright its operation would be this: In the case of Mississippi at the beginning of the school year the school superintendent would have to determine how many white schools and how many colored schools there were in the State; and when he had determined that he must make the distribution of this fund upon the basis of the existing schools and to those schools. If that be true, we see readily how these schools may be oversupplied, and what a limitation is put upon the opening of new schools during the year. It seems to me that is the effect of the amendment, that the schools in existence at the beginning of the school year are to get the entire school revenue of the year. The distribution, in other words, is upon the basis of schools and not of illiterate persons in the particular town, township, or school district who ought to be in the school or who might be brought into school. So it seems to me that this amendment fails to answer the purpose even which the Senator from Iowa had in mind.

Now, sir, some Senators have said that since the last session of Congress they have had light on this subject. I want to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] at the last Congress, and it is a much more reasonable and fair proposition than that in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was as follows:

> And the sum so paid shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, towns, parishes, and townships of each State or Territory, and when practicable, among school districts, as defined by this act, in the proportions that the number of persons in such corporations, who being of the age of ten years and over can not write, bears to the number of such persons in such State or Territory according to the census of 1880.

That amendment was proposed at the last Congress by the Senator from Ohio. There were just seven affirmative votes, and yet I submit that if we are to adopt this distribution at all, it should be to the school districts and not to schools, because a distribution to the school districts allows the liberty of organizing new schools and expanding the system of education within the school district, whereas a distribution to schools as such already established does not.

Mr. President, for one I admit that I have had great trouble with some of the provisions of this bill. I profess now that I am ready to consider any amendment that will tend to perfect it that will more certainly accomplish the object we have in view. I think we ought to insist that every Southern State shall deal with the colored people precisely as they deal with the white people, that they shall so deal with their school fund, and I want in what we add to that fund to deal in the same way with our contribution. As I have said, before any greater exaction, any stricter provision as to the kind of system they must have, anything that will tend to secure this fair and equal distribution, I am heartily for and shall support if any such propositions are made. I should not have spoken at all except for the fact that it seemed to me that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was fatally wrong in two regards: First, that it made the distribution to established schools and not to school districts; and in the second place, it distributed the equal distribution which we require the States to make of its school revenues.

Mr. President, I say the fair thing, to be accepted by all the States, by all the people of both races, is an indiscriminating and equal application of all school funds to the education of all children of school age without reference to race or color.

If some of the amendments which have been proposed, the one suggested especially by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to this amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] should prevail, I think it would meet with my support, but in the shape in which it is presented I can not support it.

Let me say, in conclusion, that if we accept the States in the South as the agencies through which this benefaction is to be distributed, then we must put our gift upon that basis that will secure, as I have said before, the co-operation, the hearty and kindly co-operation of the people of those States in executing it; and if they shall fail of this high trust, if being put upon trial before this nation and the world in dealing as trustees with the most sacred trust that ever was confided to a people—if they shall fail to respond faithfully to the trust, then if I shall remain in this Senate Chamber the moment that is developed for one I shall vote to withhold any further appropriation. If they discharge the high trust with fidelity and enthusiasm, then I believe we shall have entered upon a peaceful and a magnificent solution of the gravest problem that confronts us to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAYNE in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. FRYE. There seems to be a lull. I hope we shall have a vote now.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] expressed last night a purpose to speak on this amendment, and he is not now in the Chamber. I suppose courtesy would require, perhaps, that he should be notified; or allow the Senator from Illinois to take the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Not yet.

Mr. FRYE. Why not have a vote? The Senate is waiting for it.

Mr. HOAR. What is the pending question?

Mr. FRYE. I would not invite further discussion on the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senate——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to move an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HOAR. Then my amendment would not now be in order.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of the proposed amendment of Mr. ALLISON it is moved to strike out the words "paid in such State" and insert in lieu thereof "received by said State under the provisions of this bill;" so as to read:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children the money received by said State under the provisions of this bill shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools, &c.

Mr. DAWES. That is a mere formal amendment. It will be better to have it adopted.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I desire to move a further amendment to the amendment. I move to add these words, which are not precisely the same as those I gave notice of last night, but in substance the same; I move to add at the end of the amendment, after the word "census," "until an equal sum per capita is appropriated and paid from the national and State funds for the education of all children of school age in such State without distinction, it being the object of this act to secure equal advantages to all children of whatever color or race."

I move that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "and" and inserting what I hold in my hand. It is really a substitute for the whole amendment as amended. It is to strike all out and insert:

> And in each State and Territory in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children the money paid in such State or Territory shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools respectively in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years in such State or Territory bear to each other as shown by the said census. The foregoing provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein no distinction of race or color shall exist.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the courtesy for a second reading of the amendment, as my attention was diverted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not think there is any constitutional difficulty in this bill. The Constitution of the United States gave to Congress the power to impose taxes, without any other limitation in the tax clause than that of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the Union. It left Congress apparently, therefore, just where the Legislatures of all the States were left by their constitutions at that time and since, except as there may be in some States special qualifications and exceptions about legislative power to impose taxes. There never was a tax laid in the United States that I remember, passed either by Congress or by a State Legislature, that undertook to state the purposes for which that tax should be expended. That was left to such political discretion as the people who paid the tax acting through their representatives should think fit to exercise.

Then there is the other provision, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law. There is no other limitation except as you derive it by argument from general considerations. In that clause there is no limitation over the power of appropriation. It recognizes the power of appropriating money in the Treasury, having provided how without limitation, except for paying debts and providing for the general welfare, that money should be got into the Treasury.

The only security, therefore, that the Constitution-makers thought fit to impose upon the public treasure when it had been gathered together in the Treasury was that of the people acting through their immediate representatives and acting through the Senators elected by the States, so that the political discretion and action of those two bodies should be exerted in drawing money from the Treasury. It did not say, no constitution ever had said or could say, that no money should be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law for a specific purpose named in some other part of the Constitution. It would have been impossible, impracticable, unphilosophical, and unpatriotic; and so they left it in that way.

In addition to that, we have had a hundred years of existence, and among the very earliest acts of the earlier Congresses, if practice and precedent amount to anything in construing constitutions, as I think they do, and in every Congress since you will find a greater or smaller number of bills passed and approved by the Presidents appropriating money out of the Treasury in one form or another for objects that are not specifically named in any of the special clauses of the Constitution and for objects that have no possible relation to any of those specific powers of affirmative action imposed upon Congress as to what it may do as the expression of the public will carrying on an executive performance by affirmative and positive force of law as distinguished from paying money out of the Treasury.

So, then, without going at large into such a discussion, it is perfectly plain to my mind, with great respect to those who think otherwise, that the constitutional power of Congress to devote money in the Treasury to whatever extent Congress chooses to do so to this object or any other benevolence, foreign or domestic, is entirely clear; and I fully agree to what the eloquent Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has said as it regards the promotion of the general welfare by the universality of education as one of the three fundamental elements without which in the long run no government of the people and by the people and for the people can exist. Agreeing to that, it is unnecessary for me to fortify, as I could not by anything I should say, the case as he has so well stated it.

We then come to the question as to what we ought to do. We do find, and all agree as a fact, that in a great many of the States of this Union there is an undue and excessive proportion of people who are ignorant and of children who are ignorant, and that in those States it appears to be a fact that at this present time there are not sufficient resources available from the taxable property of the inhabitants of those States to provide for this emergency. It is therefore, as it seems to me, a case in which the common treasure of all the people may be fairly devoted in aid of this great and necessary object, for the preservation of real republican government.

That being so, we want to do it fairly, we want to do it under such safeguards that we shall be sure that the money will be devoted and applied to the very uses for which it is intended. To do less would be merely to waste the treasure of the people and to defeat the very ends that we have in view.

Now it must be said with all candor and frankness that the previous experience of the United States in devoting public treasure, whether of lands or money or whatever, to the purposes of education in several of the States—I do not say all, because it would not be true—has not been fortunate. I believe it to be true that in several of the States the donations that Congress has from time to time provided have been diverted from the objects to which they were designed and applied to others to which Congress would never have consented if the proposition had been in the first place to do that thing and in that way. Nobody, therefore, ought to object to our taking the utmost care that the purpose we have in view shall be accomplished under every safeguard of due application and due report that it is possible to devise.

When I have looked at the laws of the States in which there are large populations of white and colored people and white and colored children, of course of those people, I have found, differing from the laws of the States with which I am more familiar, that the management and adjustment of school operations is confided to a very few hands, and that in many of those States—and I dare say in all, but I have not looked them through enough to satisfy me—it is left to one man or one small board of men to determine how many school districts there shall be in a county or in a State and to determine how many schools there shall be in each district, and of which determination the particular people who live in that particular locality have no immediate power of correction or improvement. I find in those same States that the positive and affirmative statute regulation is that the white children and the colored children shall not be educated in the same school.

That being the state of the case applied to this bill, as I understand it, as it now stands, it would be within the competence of the school authority in any State to determine under the law of that State in a given county how many white schools and how many colored schools there should be, and in the exercise of that discretion which the law imputes to him he is responsible to nobody except to the power that in the end may turn him out of office and put somebody else in. In the exercise of that discretion in a county where there are ten thousand colored children and five thousand white children he may set up ten white schools and two colored schools, and yet on this bill, as it now stands, the equality being between child and child as child, or man and man as man, the law of the State conforms to the requisition of the law of the United States, and while as between each colored child and each white child that is able to get to school there is equality of education, the practical outcome is that for the great body of the colored children no provision of school-houses and school districts convenient and accommodating, established and set up, is made, while for the white children all is made that the State thinks necessary and can bear; and it can be reversed of course just the same. If the colored people of South Carolina, for instance, who are said to be in a majority there, should act together, as I sometimes have been told that the white race does, and should have their votes counted at the polls and should elect colored governors and legislators and school superintendents and the whole autonomy of that State, under this bill as it now stands it would be within their competence to set up ten colored schools to one white school, and while in each school there would be equality as between each of the children who went to the two, yet taken in the mass the colored population of South Carolina would be provided for and educated while the white population would not be.

I can not agree to a proposition of that kind. I can not agree to leave the public money of the United States in the power of any State or any State authority which can effectuate a discrimination in masses, not trying to do it as between individuals, which will work either way in the method that I have described. That is the way it looks to me.

If, then, this money is first given to these States in proportion to illiteracy without regard to the illiteracy of people who can gain any immediate and direct benefit by education from it, as the bill now stands it goes up to one hundred years or whatever the age of everybody may be; the money being given to these States it ought to be appropriated to the education of both races alike by fair means, so that the children of both races, as near as we can get at it, according to the ages where they could be properly taught, should have equal advantages and fair play, and not equal advantages and fair play as between child and child merely as persons, but equal advantages and fair play as it regards the institution of a school system that makes the proper number of districts and sets up the proper number of schools according to the necessities of each race as the law of the State requires, but those necessities are to be separately considered and separately treated. That seems to me to be fair.

Now, this amendment that I offer proposes that thing, that the money being taken to the State, it shall be divided between the white and colored schools, where the State makes that distinction, in proportion to the number of the illiterate people between the ages of ten and twenty-one, which is as near as we can get at it by the census. There would be a way, as the Commissioner of Education has shown in his report, to educe from the census the school age in each State, but it would not be the census; it would be something else, although it might be true, and that would be more philosophical. But when I turn to the laws of the State of Kentucky in force in the year 1880—and this census date is taken for all the States alike—I find that Kentucky had in force in that year (I believe she has changed it since, but that would not help this measure, which is based on the census of 1880) a law furnishing two separate ranges of age for school children between the white and the colored, the effect of which plainly is to give the white children a much larger share of the income of that State for their schools than the colored children could get upon the same basis, because it makes the school age of the colored children in narrower compass than the school age of the white children. As, for instance, it may say—I have forgotten the figures, but it illustrates just as well—that the school age of white children shall be between five and eighteen and that the school ages of the colored children shall be between five and twelve; and the consequence would be, if you distribute this upon the theory of the school age of the children by the laws of the several States as they stood at the time of the census of 1880, the State of Kentucky would get a larger proportion for its white children than it did for its colored children, and the white children would get it. That would not do. It is, therefore, necessary, as it appears to me, to take the census statement, which shows us the number of the white and colored persons in these States between ten and twenty-one, by complete and exact tables, as the basis of this division between white and colored schools.

With this amendment, as far as I now understand it, I shall most cheerfully and gladly vote for this bill; but in the state of the laws in these various States, in the state of the power that those laws give and as shown by the reports have been executed, the result of which is that the number of colored children in proportion to the population in many of these States—I do not say all, I have not looked it through—who are able to attend school and get the benefit of whatever the State provides for them is much smaller than of the white children; and it is smaller because it is within the autocratic power of the managers of the school system to whom the discretion as to the number of districts and the number of schools is left, from the cause that they establish more white schools in more convenient localities than they do colored schools, and under their laws they have a right to do it—I mean a legal right; I do not mean a moral right—and they do it. Having done it, the money of the United States, without this amendment, would go to aid and encourage the exercise of that discrimination wherein they set up by their separate arrangement for white and colored children these two methods of education, two forms of education, and enable themselves to appropriate this money, if they might, in a given county, in a given State, almost entirely to the whites and not to the colored. In that state of things, I think this amendment is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like before the Senator takes his seat to know whether his amendment provides that the distribution shall be upon the basis of white and colored population between the ages of ten and twenty-one inclusive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It says between the ages of ten and twenty-one as shown by the census.

Mr. BLAIR. Would that include both ten and twenty-one?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It says ten and twenty-one as shown by the census. If the census shows it inclusive it would be inclusive.

Mr. BLAIR. But the census shows the number, the ages of one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, &c. By this amendment we select from the census tables the number of one age after another from ten to twenty-one in order to get an aggregate; and it would be either inclusive, including the age of ten and including the age of twenty-one, or it would be excluding ten or twenty-one. Which should it be?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe there is in the census tables—I have not had time to look at them this morning—one table that shows the number of white and colored persons in each of the States between the ages of ten and twenty-one. Whether that includes or excludes those two ages I do not remember.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not remember seeing such a table. I do not think there is such a table. There is not any such in the Compendium.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there be not, I am willing to have it either way the Senator prefers, either inclusive or exclusive; but it refers to the census, and therefore whichever the census shows is what it means.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont where he uses the word "paid" to insert the word "received." There have been several amendments adopted by the Senate to that effect.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in accordance with the verbal amendment adopted this morning before the Senator from Vermont came in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that. I will modify my amendment accordingly, so as to read, "received in such State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator from New Hampshire intend to address the Senate at this time?

Mr. BLAIR. I was only about to make an observation in regard to this amendment, but I will yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to make an observation in regard to it myself.

Mr. President, I do not know that I can throw any light on this subject, and were I even able to do so it might not have the effect of changing the minds of individuals who have made this bill a great study, and especially where there is so great a desire as there seems to be for the paternity of a bill of some sort which is considered to be in the interest of education, even more so than to one amended by others, so that the result desired might be produced. I have no desire to take to myself any credit for this particular scheme, and when the Senator from Indiana insinuated that this bill was to be defeated or interfered with by legislative jugglery, I think that was an expression which might as well have been left unsaid.

I am as sincerely in favor of educating the illiterate people of this country as any Senator on this floor; but if on that account I shall be required to vote for certain provisions in the bill that I deem utterly fatal to a proper use of the fund, it certainly should not be said that it is mere jugglery on the part of persons who desire amendments to be proposed and adopted for the purpose of making this bill better. When the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New Hampshire speak of elevating the colored race in this land so that they may be qualified as citizens of the United States to perform their duties intelligently toward the Government and themselves, I say I will go as far as either of those gentlemen in that direction, provided that I can be satisfied that the mode proposed will produce that result.

My friend the Senator from Indiana spoke in reference to his having been the friend of the colored man. Why, Mr. President, I hope that all on this side of the Chamber have been the friends of the colored man. When a man is the true friend of a man either white or colored, that is all that need be said. The Senator spoke of their having visited his camp and of his having fed them. I do not wish to go into that. Were I to do so, perhaps I could give in detail the history of the suffering of some of these men and the great benefits bestowed upon this country by their acts that others perhaps know not of. The reasons for our action should first be found, and then the propositions to accord with the reasons should be made into law.

I presume that the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Massachusetts will say that this bill was conceived and brought forth for the benefit of the colored people. That was the idea in the inception of the educational bills that were urged upon Congress. Let us see if I am correct. I have had very little to do with this legislation except to vote for the bills as they have been presented and passed heretofore by the Senate. In reference to the statement made yesterday evening by the Senator from Massachusetts that all bills which had been proposed on this subject heretofore were on the basis of this one in reference to the distribution, I want to call his attention to a few that have been introduced into Congress and failed of consideration either in the committee or in the Senate.

I introduced two bills in 1882, one in 1883, and one in 1884. They were all referred to this Committee on Education and Labor. I appeared before the committee once in order to make such suggestions as seemed to me correct, but I soon came to the conclusion that what little I had to say would have no effect whatever upon the minds of that committee. I came to the conclusion also that the result in that committee would be what it ever has been, that the shrewdness and sharpness of men south of the line on that committee would get the very advantage that they have in this bill. I am not going to criticise them for it; but my conclusion then, as now, was that it was more important to some men to have a bill passed under their lead than it was to assure by a well-guarded bill the education of the colored people.

Why, sir, the proposition I made first in 1882 was that $50,000,000 be appropriated out of the revenues of the United States and distributed according to the population in the States and Territories for the benefit of the illiterate children of the whole country. That proposition was assailed by newspapers, by teachers, and by representatives, and why? Not because it proposed to take a fund out of the Treasury. That was not the reason. What was it? Because the basis of it should be for the education of the colored people. Objection was made to that bill all over the North, made to it in the very cities and towns where these Senators live, upon the very ground that it distributed money equally to all; that it ought to be distributed on the basis of the illiteracy of the people of the States, so that the colored people should have the benefit of it; being most illiterate, should receive the greatest benefit.

And further, it was not only proposed in the bills that I introduced, but in bills introduced by others, that the Government of the United States, in giving as a bounty this large fund to the people of this country for educational purposes, that the fund should be so guarded and protected in the law that there could be no chance for squandering or making an improper use of it. It was urged on the other side of the Chamber that it interfered with the rights of the States; that it interfered with the Constitution of the country; that it struck down the power of the States to exercise their rights in reference to the education of those who were entitled to education within their borders.

That objection was made, and made on that side of the Chamber. I insisted on having that protection. I insisted on having the Secretary of the Interior as one officer, the presiding officer of the Educational Bureau as another, and the President of the United States as another; that under rules and regulations prescribed by these officers this money should be distributed according to law. It was objected to. Senators on this side of the Chamber, so very earnest for the education of the people, were so earnest that something should be reported to the Senate from the Committee on Education and Labor that would seem to be an advantage to the people, that all of the safeguards in reference to the protection of this fund as it should pass from the Treasury of the United States were stricken down except the mere report to the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not wish to detain the Senate but a very short time. I did not rise to make an elaborate speech upon this subject, but I wish to ask the Senators who are opposed to the proposition introduced by the Senator from Iowa a question. Under the Constitution as it was prior to the amendments the slaves of the South were enumerated and counted as three-fifths of the population of slaves and on that three-fifths representation was given to those States where slavery existed. How is it now? Representation in the electoral college and in the Congress of the United States is given on the basis of the whole colored and white population. Sir, according to the Constitution of the United States, we to-day enumerate the colored people and they count the same as the white people, and on this basis a majority is found in Congress and Presidents elected.

How is it, however, that they are enumerated only for the benefit of the power of those States in which they reside in representation in both the electoral college and the Congress of the United States? When it comes to voting, where are they and where are they counted? The benefit of their enumeration to their friends and country ceases as they approach the ballot-box. Take the State of Mississippi. The total population of that State is 1,131,597; the white population is 479,398, the colored population 650,291. I want the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to these figures. What is the voting population of the State of Mississippi? Two hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and thirty-two. What is the white voting population? One hundred and two thousand five hundred and eighty. What the colored voting population? One hundred and thirty thousand two hundred and seventy-eight. Nearly 30,000 majority of the persons entitled to vote in that State are colored men. They are counted with their families to swell the representation in Congress and in the electoral college.

How few of them vote, and why? One hundred and twenty thousand votes were cast at the last Presidential election, only 18,000 more votes than there are white voters in that State, in which there are 30,000 more colored voters than there are white voters. What a story does this tell? I am not going to say why this is the case, because I might be mistaken; but take your argument—is it for want of education? I find the white people are educated well enough to vote; at least they do it and send their members to Congress without the votes of the colored people being counted, and send their electors to vote for President; and yet you say to the colored people, "Stand up and be counted." For what purpose? For the purpose of securing a majority in the electoral college, for the purpose of obtaining a majority in the Congress of the United States. When the election comes no man says "stand up and be counted as voters." So then you count them for the benefit of the white people, but do not count them for their own benefit or that of the country.

So, sir, it is with your school bill. You base the money that you draw from the Treasury upon the illiteracy of the people of the United States from ten years and upward; and when you come to examine what do you find? You find the illiteracy of the white people in the South averaging from 12 to 20 per cent. and the illiteracy of the colored people from 40 to 80 per cent. Then how do you draw the money? The large amount of money drawn under your bill is drawn because of the illiteracy of the colored people above school age. You say to the hundred colored men who are seventy years old, who were slaves, and who can not read and write, "Stand up here and be counted." Counted for what? "You can not read and can not write; you are above the school age; you can not go to school; but stand up and be counted." Why? That you may draw money for the benefit of the children of the white people of the South. That is your proposition.

Count them for what? For money. For whom? For themselves? No, sir. The hundred colored men who are counted to-day to draw money out of the Treasury under this proposition stand against a hundred white men who can read and write. The white men draw no money, but the hundred colored men do, and when the hundred colored men are counted for the benefit of the dollars they get from the Treasury they receive no benefit from the fund; they are not educated; but the hundred white men who are educated get an equal division of that, for what? For the benefit of their children. The colored men get only half of that which they have drawn upon the basis of their illiteracy.

Mr. President, this is the old story. Alas! Northern men have always been found in this country and have always been found in the Congress of the United States to legislate in any direction that was wanted on the colored man for the benefit of the white man. If they are not to be represented in the electoral college, if they are not to be represented in Congress, and if they are to be counted merely to make numbers in Congress and in the electoral college, and to draw money for the benefit of others, I think it is about time that we consider some other proposition in reference to a basis for future action.

What wrong is there in this amendment of the Senator from Iowa? You and I stand up here and are counted. I may be an illiterate, and therefore I draw money, but I am beyond the school age and do not get any benefit from it. You are not an illiterate; you do not therefore draw any money, but you have two children and so have I. I draw money for your benefit, for only half of it goes to my children, though I have drawn it. Is that fair, is that honest, is that just to the colored man? Oh, but you say as the Senator from Indiana said, the great idea is to educate the people. So it is, and in our States we educate our people. My own State pays more money by levying a tax on the people to obtain it than you appropriate the first year in this bill for the benefit of the whole. We pay our school fund out of our own pockets. We make no distinction; we appropriate it for the benefit of the schools of all the people. This is our idea and our system.

Now, then, if these people in the South appropriate money for the benefit of all schools from their own pockets, it is only on the basis that it should be done everywhere; but when you appeal to the Government of the United States to appropriate money because you have four or five million people that are illiterate among you and you appeal on their account, in God's name let them have the benefit in proportion to the illiteracy of the two races. That is the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, that whatever money is drawn from the Treasury of the United States shall be disbursed by the States and Territories according to the illiteracy of whom? Of the two races that are to be supplied, the white and the colored. The colored race having a larger percentage of illiterates, drawing a larger part—in fact over three-fourths of the money—in my judgment should be entitled to receive that proportion of the money drawn.

The Senator from Massachusetts said that if we did this several of the States would have to change their constitutions. I must confess I was somewhat surprised at this argument coming from so eminent a Senator as the Senator from Massachusetts. What effect has this appropriation on the constitution of a State? It has nothing to do with it. Your State constitutions provide, perhaps, for the distribution of your school fund equally. I do not know. Some of them do I know. Very well, that applies to the taxes raised based on the property of the State. That has nothing to do with this proposition. This is a fund given by the Government of the United States to help educate the illiterates of the country, and the State representatives are only agents for the distribution of it according to the scheme of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator whether he desires as the result of combined expenditure, State and nation, a school system in any State in which one child shall have an advantage over another in education?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator. I do not know of any school system in any State, outside of Kentucky, perhaps (and I believe they have changed their law), which makes a distinction between the children of school age.

Mr. HOAR. My question was whether the Senator desired that there should be in the future, as the result of this combined national and State expenditure, such a distinction?

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator. "Combined!" You must get them "combined." I have nothing to do with what the States shall do with their own funds; but when you ask me what I desire done with this fund, then I will answer you. I desire this fund to be distributed for the benefit of those people for whom the citizens of this country understand it is appropriated, according to the ratio of illiteracy between the whites and the blacks.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. I never fail to yield to anybody, although some fail to yield to me.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, this whole expenditure is proposed to be upon a condition no matter what the States have done in the past. The Senator's views are not any stronger than I have expressed in my Copiah report and in a hundred other forms with regard to outrages in the South; but in the future this bill says to these States, "You must expend equally and have a common-school system which gives every child a good education, black and white equally; you shall not have any of this money unless that is done." Now if, when this is done, we say that the black children shall have three times as much apiece as the white children, then those States whose constitutions now require that they shall distribute their funds so equally have got to alter them, or you will have school systems in all those States where the black children get in the future two or three times as much per capita apiece in the schools as the whites. It seems to me, with great respect to the gentlemen who differ with me on this subject, that it would be very much as if we undertook to remedy this gross outrage of suppressing the colored vote in the past by coming in by national power and establishing a system in the future that the blacks should have two votes and the whites one.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I will answer the Senator's constitutional proposition, because that is the way he started out. He said they would have to amend the State constitutions. I may not be as great a constitutional lawyer as the Senator, but I do know something, and what I know I do know about as well as most people. I do know as a lawyer that the proposition of the Senator is not tenable. Why? We make this appropriation as a school fund for the education of children upon the same principle that we make any appropriation for the benefit of the people. I suppose the Senator will agree to that. We may give every dollar, if we choose, to the colored people, without giving a dollar to the white people, and we may not only do that, but we may point out the mode and manner under and by which the money shall be distributed to them in their schools. We have the power to do that. Then, if we have the power to do that, I want to ask what figure does it cut with the constitution of the State to which we give it?

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the State of Mississippi now appropriates a million dollars, and it says in its constitution $500,000 of that shall go to the white children and $500,000 to the black, supposing them to be equal in numbers in the case I put. The United States comes in and gives her a million more, but says that it shall all go to the blacks. Then you have got a school system in Mississippi where, the white and black children being exactly equal in the case supposed—they are not in fact—the white children are getting $500,000 for the same number of heads, while the black children are getting $1,500,000. That is the proposition, putting the two together.

Mr. LOGAN. What has that got to do with the constitution of Mississippi? Nothing in the world.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. LOGAN. I do understand you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the Senator exactly as he means, and I say that in my judgment he is mistaken. I asked him a question a while ago, if we could not appropriate all of this to the colored people. He admits it. If we can do that, can we not appropriate a part of it for the colored people? If we can provide for the distribution of the fund to the colored people, can we not provide for a part of its distribution? We may provide for appropriating the money. The States are not bound to take it unless they choose to do so. There is no compulsion. There is nothing that infringes upon their constitution, nothing to impair their rights, nothing to interfere with their laws. They may distribute their own money as they see proper under their constitution, for their constitution applies solely to the money raised by taxation upon their people and not to money raised by the Government. So there is nothing in the proposition of the Senator, in my judgment, if he will pardon me for saying so.

Let us go a little further with it, sir. He asks me if I wish to see a school system that will give $500,000 to the white people and a million and a half to the colored people in Mississippi. The colored people in Missippi have at least a quarter of a million more in population than the whites. The colored people need the money. The whites do not need it. When you ask me the question if I would see a greater proportion go to the colored people there than to the white people, I say yes, I would; and that is exactly what I mean, if the Senator wants to know; and I tell him that the people of the Northern country want to see that done, for that is their understanding about it. The people of this country do not understand that we are going to undertake to educate all the white people of the South. They understand no such thing, but sympathy is excited in the people of the North in favor of the poor colored man who has been a slave for two centuries, who has hoed the corn and tilled the cotton, who has built up fortune after fortune for other people, who has lived without learning his letters under a law that proscribed him and prevented him from obtaining an education, until his ignorance was as dark as midnight; and we having liberated these people and placed them on the plane of the white man as citizens of the United States in their illiterate and ignorant condition, we feel it to be our duty to elevate them by education up to the standard where they may as good citizens judge and decide in reference to laws and constitutions as others do. That is the proposition, sir, and that is what is in the minds and the hearts of the American people.

Sir, so far as I am concerned I am willing to test the question before my constituents as to whether they are taking money out of their pockets with the full knowledge that they are doing it to educate only partially the colored people, and that a portion of it is to go to other than the colored people of the South, where the money is drawn wholly upon their illiteracy. When you had a bill before Congress that proposed to educate all the illiterate people of the United States by donations from Congress distributed according to the population of the States and Territories, then the proposition was entirely different; but as I said that proposition was voted down. When I say "voted down" I mean by the acclaim of the people, for they were opposed to it, and although I myself introduced one of the propositions I readily saw that the people were opposed to that character of legislation, and they were only brought to the point because they believed it was measurably for the benefit of the colored man.

Why should any man in the Senate of the United States or in the other branch of Congress representing a Southern constituency object to the majority of this fund going where greater illiteracy is found, I should like to know? If it is the desire of your people that these colored people shall be elevated by education to the same plane with themselves, it seems to me that laying personal success to one side, the heart speaking honestly and candidly would say, "Yes; it is for them that we want it." As has been said and properly so by themselves, these people come not as beggars for the white people, they come not as suppliants for their own class of white citizens, but for the poor, the unfortunate, the down-trodden colored man, who learned naught of government or of anything with regard to the history of himself or his country until he was made a freeman and permitted to get a partial education in the different schools where he was permitted to go.

There is another proposition to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator will pardon me for calling his attention so frequently; I do it merely because of the speech that he made yesterday in which he stated to the Senate of the United States that nearly every proposition by the educational people of this country was on the basis of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I beg your pardon.

Mr. LOGAN. Then what did the Senator say? I will give way while he states it.

Mr. HOAR. I said:

> The scheme of this bill in the particular which is now attacked by the Senator from Maine is the scheme of every proposition which has been made for national aid to education at the South.

That is what I said.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him in that connection?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to what I said, and to what perhaps he did not notice. In the last Congress when this bill was before the Senate a proposition was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the line of the pending proposition, only as I think better, because it distributed the money to the districts instead of to the schools, and upon that proposition the vote of the Senator from Illinois was recorded with mine and that of the Senator from Massachusetts against it. So the question was discussed then on that line.

Mr. LOGAN. That does not cut any particular figure.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no; it is not a question of figure.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not cut any particular figure how anybody voted or how anybody did not vote. On a great many propositions we vote very differently, but I am discussing this question from the standpoint of this bill as now presented.

Mr. HOAR. I will say to the Senator that my statement related solely to those schemes which were intended not to be entirely national, like those of distributing equally, of which I myself introduced one, the first one ever introduced as far as I know—it was introduced about 1869 or 1870—where the gift was to be to the whole country; but every scheme that I know of, which is either confined to the South, or, if not confined to the South, like the present one has a basis which carries it chiefly there, is on this particular basis. That is what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Indiana called my attention to the fact that I voted for a proposition introduced by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON. You voted against it.

Mr. LOGAN. I voted against it; and it was a proposition in the same line with this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; it was a proposition directly in the line of the Allison amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. It says:

> That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools not sectarian in character.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not the right amendment. If he will allow me, I will read it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. This was the amendment of the Senator from Ohio:

> And the sum so paid shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, towns, parishes, and townships of each State or Territory, and, when practicable, among school districts, as defined by this act, in the proportions that the number of persons in such corporations, who being of the age of ten years and over can not write bears to the number of such persons in such State or Territory according to the census of 1880.

That was the proposition, and it is exactly in the line of the Allison amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to get off into a discussion on side issues, because it is sometimes the case that arguments are attempted to be answered by trying to show how somebody voted at some former time on some former proposition that had nothing to do with the pending proposition. I have never considered that very much of an argument, but still I am perfectly willing for others to indulge in it if they desire.

The amendment he refers to is not such an amendment taken as a whole that would be in line with the proposition in its machinery.

At the time I was interrupted (and I did not object to it, and never do) I was about calling the attention of Senators here present to the fact that the educational men from all over this country, North and South, have ever proposed a distribution on the very line of the Allison amendment. I call attention to a convention that met in Louisville, Ky., which was largely attended by professors and educational people. They draughted a bill and presented it here embodying their views in different sections in reference to this proposition. I have the bill here and I should like to read the section that they proposed in reference to the distribution of the money. It is as follows:

That in States or Territories, or portions of the same, where separate schools for white and colored children are sustained, the moneys received under this act shall be divided and expended among such schools in proportion to the respective number of white and colored illiterates enumerated therein at the United States census last preceding.

There is the Allison amendment adopted right there in the bill framed by those men from all parts of the United States, and there is where the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] got it. It is almost verbatim.

So as I said it was understood not only by the Northern people, but by the educational people all over the country, that this money was to be distributed in proportion to the illiteracy of the two classes. When I say "all" I know there are exceptions, but I mean the great bodies where they have given expression to their opinions.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether that bill contains the condition which this one does, that there shall be in the State affected a full and complete common-school system for all children? That is the essential distinction.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, and I beg his pardon for saying it, I have the highest regard for him and certainly a high opinion of his ability, and I do hope that so intelligent and so great a lawyer as I recognize the Senator to be will not undertake to pettifog this case.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator certainly will be willing to answer the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I will answer the question.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether that bill is not without that condition?

Mr. LOGAN. Without what condition?

Mr. HOAR. Without the condition that there shall be provided by the State a full and complete common-school system for all its children, which this bill contains, and which is the very essence of the thing. There is no such provision in that bill.

Mr. LOGAN. If it cuts any figure in the distribution of this money, where we appropriate it for the benefit of the common schools in the Southern States, whether the provision which was in their bill has anything to do with this measure, I can not understand it. They proposed to give this fund to the States and Territories to be distributed on the basis mentioned.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator will pardon me; I hate to interrupt him.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not the slightest interruption, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. The gentlemen who advocate the Allison amendment and the gentlemen who agree with me seem to have a total misunderstanding with each other upon the one simple proposition which is the basis of this whole thing, and I never can find anybody who answers the question which I put to the honorable Senator just now who does not see that the difference between us disappears. My proposition is to take a sum of money and say to the States, "You must yourselves do everything from your own pocket which, in addition to this, is required to give every black and white child a good common-school education, and when you have done that this shall constitute a part of the fund with which you do it." When that is done, if we say all the funds shall go to the illiterate class of blacks, or a large proportion of it, then we have said that in that State, unless the State makes an unequal distribution of its own fund, there shall be a better education for one class of children than another founded on race; but if you do not put in such a condition and simply come in as George Peabody does, or as Slater does, or as the bill which the Senator reads does, and say, here are $1,000,000 which we want you to take to aid education in your State, then of course the Senator is entirely and absolutely right; it ought to be given to the blacks and to nobody else, or, if to anybody else, in a very small proportion.

I utterly and entirely agree with my honorable friend from beginning to end, and with the Senator from Iowa, and all the others, that until the whole illiteracy is cured the blacks should be preferred. It is only in a bill which says you must cure all the illiteracy in your State before you get anything from us that we say then the education between them all shall be equal.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not say this to reply to his argument, but I want him to understand me.

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. HOAR. Because it would be pretty difficult, being a question here of education and human liberty, for me to be found absent from any band which my honorable friend is leading.

Mr. LOGAN. I want the Senator to understand that I do not insinuate any such thing, because what I say I mean. I have the highest respect for the Senator's opinion, and for his integrity, and for him in every respect. It is not that, but it is the question that we do not all see alike. The Senator agrees with me in this, and I do not wish to misstate it, that up to the time this illiteracy is obliterated the money ought to be divided as I say.

Mr. HOAR. I say so. I do not mean the time in point of this entire period; but when you have got the system which we are to help pay for. Of course illiteracy in one sense is never to be obliterated as long as children are born.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, but this bill only runs for eight years and it fits the very niche of the Senator's proposition. It runs for eight years commencing with the age of ten. It is to obliterate the illiteracy that exists now. He agrees with me. After that divide it equally. That is all I want. That is all of my proposition, and that is all there is of it. I propose to say in this bill, divide it according to the illiteracy of the two races, not in some future bill, but now when we are proposing to benefit them, at this time; and I will go further, too, and I want to say this—I say to Senators who reported the bill that in your bill you do not expend much more money in the whole South than we will expend in that little time in my State where I live. Hence it is a drop in the bucket, and when I proposed an amendment here to increase the appropriation some turned up their noses as much as to say, "LOGAN wants to kill the bill." I do not want to do any such thing. I am for the education of these people; I am for it honestly, and I say it to the white people, and they can preach it from the housetops of the South if they have a mind to. I will go there and discuss it with them, that I am for giving the larger portion of it to the colored people, because they are the ones who are entitled to it; it is on account of their illiteracy that you draw this money, and they are entitled to the majority of it.

But I was going to ask what will $7,000,000 amount to in sixteen States, and a small portion of it distributed in all the States? It amounts to bagatelle. I have noticed the amount of taxation in the State of Georgia, in the State of Alabama, and other States that I could mention, and with the amount of taxes levied in some of those States for school purposes there is not sufficient to give the children four months' schooling in the year. Then you add this to their little pittance and what will it amount to?

Hence, in good faith, instead of $77,000,000 in eight years, merely to get people's names before the country that they want to educate the people of the whole country when they can not do it under this bill, I propose to give $138,000,000 for that education, and I will vote for it in the bill running over ten years, commencing at $10,000,000 and increasing for five years, and then decreasing until the ten years expire, so as to make the education run from the time the child is ten years old until he is twenty years old.

Then I shall propose another amendment to the bill, and that is that $2,000,000 extra shall be appropriated in connection with the bill to do what? To build school-houses. You may say what you please about the bill requiring you to give equal education; it is very easy to pass a law that school districts and neighborhoods shall build them themselves, and so on. I propose to give aid to building school-houses where none exist, where the people are poor, where they are not able to do it either by taxation or otherwise. In my State the townships tax themselves a tax for the purpose of building their school-houses, and so on. I find that the laws are different in some of the Southern States. Hence I propose to amend the bill by appropriating $2,000,000 for the benefit of those poor colored people, or poor white people, if you please, where they have no school-houses and are not able to build them. The appropriation of a school fund would not benefit children very much if they have not a school-house at which to attend.

There is nothing requiring the building of school-houses unless it be done by this appropriation, supervised by the Interior Department or whatever Department supervises it. I do not agree to that proposition, however. I think there ought to be a supervisory control by the Government of this money wherever it goes, it makes no difference where. When we had the power in the Government it was said we wanted it under Republican control. It was not so with me. You have now the Democratic party in power, and I am as much for putting it in the control of the Government as I was then, and appointing a commission or a good man at the head of the Bureau of Education who will supervise it and see that school-houses are built, that the schools are proper, so far as this fund is concerned.

I think it would be better for the State if that was the case. I will tell you why. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] made a remark the other day, although he is opposed to the bill, which will prove my position beyond all question. When I say "control" I do not mean that the Commissioner should regulate your schools; I do not mean that he should tell you what you should teach or what you should not teach, but I mean that he should have such a control as to make examinations and report as to where the Government funds go and how used—that they were properly distributed. It would not interfere with your States, but it would save you a great deal of trouble on the line that the Senator from Texas spoke. Suppose that in some places the schools do not suit and complaint is made and an investigation follows. If you had a man under the Government who had sufficient control to examine papers and see that the money was properly expended you would never have trouble of that kind. In my judgment it would be better for you, and better for the people, and better for the Government if that were the case. It is not the case in the bill, however. I wish it were.

As I said, there seems to be a determination to pass the bill if it had nothing in it but just the naked proposition to dump $77,000,000 into some pool somewhere, if it was called an educational pool. That seems to be the disposition, and to pass it without any regard as to how the fund shall be protected.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say in reference to this subject, and what I have said now I have said for the purpose of placing myself fairly before my constituents on the record in this case. I hope that these amendments will be agreed to. I think the bill would be much better with them than without them, and therefore I advocate them. I have been in favor of education ever since I have been old enough to make the matter a study. I have always advocated liberal education wherever I have lived in town, city, or country. I have always been in favor of common schools and schools of a high grade everywhere and I am to-day. In my little town where I lived at one time we have one of the finest normal schools in the United States. I did what I could to get it there. It is a flourishing school or college to-day, sending forth teachers to all parts of the land. So it is no new thing for me to be an advocate of public education.

Therefore I say to Senators here, the bill should not be run through; it should be examined carefully, and it should be guarded in reference to the expenditure of this money, and especially in reference to the proportion in which it is to be distributed to the two races of people. If the Senator from New Hampshire wants to arraign me before the Northern people or the Southern people because I oppose the proposition in his bill, I say to him to do it. I stand before the country upon the idea that we started with, that the white people of the South have not asked for it and do not need it, that the emancipated race are the ones who were intended to receive its benefits, and the ones who should receive them. And if they do and if this money should be used as it ought to be used, for the benefit of the colored people, you will find the time will come in the history of that unfortunate race when there will be songsters and poets in their midst. You will find orators of a superior character among that race if you will only educate them. There is in the colored race an element of music, of poetry, of oratory, that is seldom found anywhere else when we give them the advantages that the white race have had. Let them have that advantage, and if they can outstrip us in the race of life, in God's name let them have the chance. I do not know why the white man with all his advantages and all the privileges that he has had in this Government in times past should fear the colored man. He should rather reach out his hand to him and say, "While you are struggling down in that pit of ignorance and despair I will with what strength I have take your hand and lift you up to the plane where we should both stand, having an equal and a fair chance in life."

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator before he sits down whether he has had his attention called to the Allison amendment as it has been amended by the Senate and as it at present stands, because I think it meets his views as well as mine?

Mr. LOGAN. I have not. It has not been adopted yet.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if my amendment to the Allison amendment was adopted by the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. It was not adopted by the Senate, but in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRYE. It was adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. No, no.

Mr. HARRIS. It was amended.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. The Senator from Iowa offered an amendment which was amended on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. Mine was adopted.

Mr. HOAR. That was adopted. Then the amendment which I moved to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was also adopted; and the amendment so amended is now pending. To that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved a substitute. I should like to have the amendment as it stands amended already read for the information of the Senate, because it is exactly in the line of the speech of the Senator from Illinois, as I understand him, and it precisely expresses my views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 2 add:

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children the money received by said State under the provisions of this bill shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census, until an equal sum per capita is appropriated and paid from the national and State funds for the education of all children of school age in such State without distinction, it being the object of this act to secure equal advantages to all children of whatever color or race.

Mr. HOAR. That is the way it stands now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as a substitute will be read.

Mr. GEORGE. Are we to understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands not. The Chair misunderstood the Secretary.

Mr. HOAR. It was adopted, distinctly put by the Chair, and carried in my hearing. There is no doubt about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow the Chair a moment he will state, as he has been absent for an hour or two, that the original amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa has been amended by an amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and now an amendment is offered in the nature of a substitute by the Senator from Vermont, which is the question pending before the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wanted to understand the matter.

Mr. BLAIR. The pending question is, as I understand it, upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute moved as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, that having been amended by the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN. Let the substitute be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield that the substitute may be read?

Mr. BLAIR. Let the substitute be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And in each State and Territory in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money received in such State or Territory shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools respectively in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years in such State or Territory bear to each other, as shown by the said census. The foregoing provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein no distinction of race or color shall exist.

Mr. BLAIR. I trust that the substitute may be adopted. It removes all the essential difficulties that were inherent in the Allison amendment. It carries the money upon the best attainable accurate basis to the children, white and colored, in those States where the money is to be distributed for the support of the schools, white and colored, in those States where separate schools are the order of the day, and also provides that should there be mixed schools those who complete their education in such schools shall have their proper proportion of the money. It gives to the whites no more than to the blacks, to the blacks no more than to the whites; and the other provisions of the bill require a like equitable distribution of the funds of the State; so that by this proposed amendment we shall avoid the difficulties that were liable to wreck the bill had the amendment of the Senator from Iowa been adopted. I think myself that the interests of the bill, the prospect of its enactment into law, and a harmonious administration should it become a law, would be greatly improved by the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, I do not think any one yields to myself—and I should like the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] for I am talking to him——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire requests the attention of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BLAIR. I was about to say to the Senator from Illinois that I do not believe he has a friend in this country who appreciates more highly than I do his great services in the Legislature of the country and in the field. There is no one who more highly than I appreciates the deep obligation that the colored race of this country is under to him personally. And I was a little surprised at an occasional remark which he uttered as he proceeded in his address to the Senate. But I do not think this is either the time or the place to agitate considerations of any but the very highest character.

I do not think that it is an occasion when anything save the interests of the country at large, for the time being and for the time yet to be, should enter into our deliberations. I have observed something of the course of public men on this question since it was brought to the attention of the American people, and I take pleasure in saying that to my mind no American citizen has ever come up to the full height of appreciation of the emergency that is upon the American people and has been willing to put in propositions to the Congress of the American people his full sentiments like the Senator from Illinois.

The amount appropriated by the bill is not likely to be sufficient for the removal of this evil, but it will open the way to a more just appreciation of its magnitude and to a more enlarged and statesmanlike action in the future. I believe that the developments which unavoidably must reach the public mind through the practical operation of the bill for one or two years will make manifest the necessity of even larger appropriations. I do not anticipate that they will be permanent appropriations, but by the developments that will come from the practical operations of the law the public mind will become duly apprehensive and sensitive upon the nature and the extent of the alarming illiteracy which now in a halting and a feeble way we are undertaking to remove.

It has been often said during this debate that all the educators of the country have made a proposition similar to that contained in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. There has never been made upon the floor of the Senate, in any bill that has been introduced, nor in any formal utterance of any educational convention on the face of this continent to my knowledge, a proposition like that of the Senator from Iowa as compared with the other provisions of the bill. The great convention alluded to several times, which was held in Louisville, Ky., formulated its action in this resolution:

Resolved, That this convention cordially approves the principle of giving Federal aid to be distributed among the several States and Territories upon the basis of illiteracy: Provided, That such aid shall be distributed under the State laws and by the State authorities exclusively, but with proper guarantees for its faithful application.

There has never been made a proposition for the distribution of the proposed appropriation from the General Government to the children of any particular race—certainly never any such proposition in connection with provisions like those in the bill pending before the Senate. There was embodied in a minority report of the committee of the House of Representatives in the Forty-eighth Congress a proposed bill which it was supposed when the discussion would be reached some time during that Congress the minority would move as a substitute for the majority bill. In the bill which that minority proposed there was a provision substantially the same as that in the Allison amendment making a discrimination in favor of the colored race; but that bill contains no provision that the funds of the State shall not be distributed in the way of discrimination in favor of the white population.

I have often alluded to the evil which must result from any attempt on the part of the National Government to enforce the idea that the white people in the South are not responsible for the school education of all the children who may live within their special jurisdiction, the black as well as the white; and recognizing that obligation, requiring the discharge of that obligation as a condition precedent, the money coming from the National Government is by the terms of the bill to be distributed in the same equitable way without distinction of race or color, equally to all.

I could read in extenso from those who participated in the Louisville convention, from the representative men who were in that convention, and from their testimony before the committees of the Senate and the other House, in which they urged this national aid, and urged it as it was impressed upon them by the action of the convention and as the representatives of that convention; and nowhere is there any suggestion that the colored man shall receive this aid because he is a black man. The distinction of race and color has never been enunciated save in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa; for this other matter did not reach Congress in the form of a bill; it was only a proposition, and as a part of that proposition the States were left to use their own funds as they pleased.

In regard to the action of Congress itself upon the question of race discrimination, we have been administering a common-school system in the District of Columbia for many years, and we have recognized by national authority just what has been done in the States—a system of separate schools. To be consistent with ourselves, if we should adopt the Allison amendment we should forever hereafter in this same District of Columbia give to the colored scholar from $3 to $4 as often as we give $1 to the white scholar for education here in this District. Would the Senate, would the nation consent to that? No, sir.

The provisions of the bill and of the amendment which the Senator from Vermont has offered simply require the application to be operative in all the States throughout the country of the same principles which we have adopted in the maintenance of the school system in the District of Columbia.

There is much more that might be said, but I have no wish to prolong this debate. I hope that there may be a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] for the amendment moved by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as amended.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I only wish to say a single word. The Senator from Vermont stated that he had heard that the State of Kentucky had a difference of school age between whites and blacks. Neither of the Senators from Kentucky is here, and I merely wish to say that the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1882-'83 states as follows in regard to Kentucky:

In 1882-'83 the figures show a large increase of youth of school age, particularly of colored youth, whose increase was nearly three-fourths of the whole increase, which was mainly due perhaps to the fact that the school age was changed from 6-16 to 6-20, or the same as that for whites.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; I stated before that I understood since the census of 1880 the State of Kentucky had changed its law; but the bill refers to the census and the condition of 1880 as of universal application. The laws in force in Kentucky at that time, as I understand and see from these official tables—I have not studied out their statutes, and so speak with that reserve—provide that for white children the school age shall be from six years to twenty years, and for colored children from six years to sixteen years, which, of course, is a heavy discrimination against the colored person.

Mr. CALL. That is true; but I merely wanted to say that that had been corrected.

I wish further to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to another fact. The Senator from Vermont stated that by reason of the laws in some of the States the distribution of the school fund was in the hands of a single person or of a board composed of a few persons, and not as in other States in the hands of districts and district trustees or commissioners.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator, if I may interrupt him, misunderstood me; at least I did not intend to say that in that form. What I said was, that as far as I had been able to examine their laws I found that the discretionary power of creating the number of school districts and establishing the number of schools as between the two races did not rest with the people of the districts, but with the superior authority.

Mr. CALL. That is much better expressed than I did it, but it is the same idea.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I said before.

Mr. CALL. But by reason of that fact, the Senator said, there had been a discrimination adverse to the colored people in those States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that I understand to be so.

Mr. CALL. The best and only proper test about that is in reference to the actual school attendance. The Senator from Vermont will agree with me that the actual school attendance will demonstrate whether that is true. Let us take the State of Vermont, which the Senator will admit is a good State, for example, and compare it with these States, because I am anxious to vindicate the people of the Southern States from the imputation that they have not, without any aid from the National Government, acted with perfect impartiality, of their own accord, as between the two races.

In the State of Vermont the per cent. of average attendance of school youth in the State is 47.86 in the public schools. Let us compare that with South Carolina, which is considered to be the representative of all sorts of unfair discrimination, and see what it is. The per cent. of average daily attendance in South Carolina for 1883-'84 was 43.52. The per cent. of increase was 1.20. The per cent. of decrease in the State of Vermont was 1.20. In Mississippi the per cent. of attendance is 34.51, and you will find that in the State of Minnesota it is only 25 per cent. of daily attendance.

I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that if it be true that this percentage evidences the fact that there are a very large number, over 50 per cent. of children in the State of Vermont who do not attend the public schools, it is an evidence of discrimination, of unfair administration, for it applies as much to one part of the country as the other. But it is not true. There are other necessities and other circumstances which account for that, doubtless in the poverty, in the want of means, in the employments of the people; but it evidences the fact that there is the same fidelity in the administration of this trust in the States which have been arraigned here for discriminating between the two races and the State of Vermont. The percentage of daily attendance in the Southern States, without any assertion in these reports of any discrimination, is a fair one, and compares favorably with that of other States in the Union.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to suggest that we have, if we can get it, unanimous consent to take the vote on the pending amendments and on the bill at 5 o'clock? I ask unanimous consent that the vote upon the pending amendments and the bill be taken at 5 o'clock. I think that the friends of the bill are murdering it by talking it to death, and I should like to have a vote before we get into a minority.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object, Mr. President, if delay will kill it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My distinguished friend from Florida cited the State of Vermont to show that there is no discrimination in the Southern States as to educational privileges and practice between the white and colored. I wish to tell him, as I suppose he is already aware, that there is not any such discrimination in the State of Vermont, and, therefore, his application of his case would not apply. But there is still another reason wherein I think I can show my friend that he is deluding himself with his own statistics. The average daily attendance he says in Vermont is 45 per cent., and in South Carolina it is greater. Granted that the statistics are true.

Mr. CALL. No; it is less in South Carolina.

Mr. HARRIS. It is 47 in Vermont and 43 in South Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; we will call it equal, because I come now to the real point. In the State of Vermont, according to its laws and practice, the actual school year, in which the children go to school year in and year out, is nine or ten months. I do not remember it exactly, but just like a high school or a college it is education all the time, with intervals for rest and play and amusement that young people should have. Therefore, although 90 per cent. of all the children of school age in Vermont get three or four or five months' attendance at school, when you come to the average daily attendance at one season of the year, in the rural districts one class of children go to school, and therefore in the whole year only make an average daily attendance of so much, and in another part of the year another set go to school.

Mr. HOAR. Women teach the smaller children in summer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, women keep school in summer, as my friend suggests; and in winter the larger boys and larger girls who are engaged in avocations of the farm and shop, &c., all go, and many of the little children who go in summer do not go to the winter schools on account of danger to their health in hot school-houses, and cold snows, and all that. So the comparison that my friend makes is entirely wide of the mark.

Now, let us take another that seems to come to the mark. In Alabama, where by law there must be separate white and colored education and white and colored schools, the whole number of white children of school age in the year 1883–'84 according to this table was 233,000. I leave off the odd hundreds to save time. The whole number of colored children of school age was 186,000, which is a little more than three-quarters of the whites. Now I come down to the whole number of white pupils in the public schools. There were 130,000. The whole number of colored pupils in the public schools, without reference to the length of time that either of them went, was 84,000, only about three-fifths, or a little over; I am not stating exactly the precise proportion but near enough to see it.

Now, come down to the number of schools, the number of children being what I have stated. Public schools for whites, 3,421; public schools for colored only, 1,797; so that the Senator will see—and I do not make imputations, I do not mean to make any imputations, but for one cause or another the proportionate facilities of schools and school-houses and school districts as between the two races does not appear to be in ratio to the number of white and colored people who ought to be taught.

Mr. CALL. I will simply say in reply to the Senator from Vermont that I am governed by these statistics, which show that in Vermont the percentage of average attendance of school youth is 47.86, and there is another table showing the average daily attendance to be 47.607. So you have got the average attendance of the population in reference to those who come and those who go and spend a part of the time and also the average daily attendance. I take it that the tables are meant for that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not help it out at all.

Mr. CALL. That is, your whole average attendance in proportion to the entire school youth is 47 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken as to the annual attendance.

Mr. CALL. I say there are but two tables, one for daily and the other for annual attendance. In the State of Alabama, to which the Senator referred, there are in the public schools 84,065 colored pupils out of a colored school age of 186,209. I submit to the Senator from Vermont that that is a fair proportion of colored people in average attendance, and they could not attend school without some facilities. It is true the schools are not as long, but I say that 84,000 average attendance out of 186,000 is a fair proportion to the whites, and considering the fact of the greater means of the whites than the colored, it is an evidence of a perfectly fair administration of the school fund in those States as between the races, because that proportion compares favorably with the children in attendance in the Northern States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What amendment was the last one?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to announce that the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was.

Mr. DOLPH. I now, agreeably to previous notice, offer an amendment, the first amendment on the printed paper which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any State until three-fourths of all the States have so accepted the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, on a former occasion I undertook to state generally the object and what I supposed to be the necessity of this amendment. As the bill now stands it provides that no money shall be paid to any State until the Legislature of the State shall by bill or resolution accept the provisions of the act, and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior. I do not apprehend that it is the intention of the Senate that when one State has accepted the provisions of the bill it shall receive its pro rata appropriation for the year. I do not understand it to be the intention of the Senate that we shall enter upon this scheme of Federal aid to education until a sufficient number of States have accepted its provisions to insure that the scheme will be successful. Therefore I apprehend that some rule is necessary, that we should make some provisions fixing the time when the act shall go into effect and the money be apportioned between the States. The only question with me is what is a reasonable rule. Certainly we must have some rule, and if the one proposed by me is not the proper one, my amendment may be changed.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill has been already amended so that no State gets anything until her Legislature accepts, and then she gets only her proportion, and it would seem to be ruinous to the operation of the bill if that State should have to wait until three-fourths of all the States took this action, when it is the general sentiment of many Senators that their States should not take it at all. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] the other day at the commencement of his remarks gave notice of his design to offer an amendment, which I understand he will press very soon, providing that any State not desiring to take its proportion of this fund can turn it over to the general fund and let it go in the general distribution to the States needing it.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question or two.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. Is it his understanding that the bill as it now stands would authorize the payment to a single State of its pro rata proportion of the appropriation for a single year in case no other States had accepted its provisions within the year?

Mr. BLAIR. There is nothing stated as to the time within which the acceptance shall take place. I understand that every State must accept by an act of its Legislature, in accordance with the amendment to the first or second section offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and adopted without objection; and that being done, any State having complied with the conditions of the act would be entitled to its proportion, should there have been already made an oppropriation by Congress, for even the first year yet remains to be appropriated for. Supposing the bill to become a law, the first year it passes under the examination of the Committee on Appropriations and of Congress, and in that case, the appropriation having been made, there is a fund in the Treasury, and the State which has brought herself within the terms of the law would be entitled to her pro rata, and she ought not to be obliged to wait until all the other States of the country see fit to accept before she shall be allowed to receive it.

Mr. DOLPH. I understood that to be the position of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor. I understand his position to be that if there is an appropriation at the time and a single State has accepted the provisions of the bill, it shall receive its proportion of the money appropriated whether any other State of the whole thirty-eight ever accepts its provisions or not. In other words, if Mississippi, or Alabama, or Texas accepts the provisions of the bill, that State or those States will receive their proportion whether a majority of the Southern States accept the provisions of the bill or not.

Now, it is the opinion of some members of the Senate, and I think it is not free from doubt, that the bill carries its own appropriation, and that as soon as the bill passes there will be an appropriation made by it for the first year. I for one am not willing that we should commence this experiment by paying money to a single State, or even to half a dozen States, and I do not believe the Senate is willing that we shall. Therefore I think my amendment is necessary; and if three-fourths is too large a number of the States, some one should test the sense of the Senate by proposing an amendment fixing another number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we had better have an expression of the Senate on that point. I want to say that I feel very sure that some States would not take their proportion if they could be relieved of the burden of the payment which they would have to make; but of course if the States have got to pay their money they will take what little they can get back, although it will be only a small percentage perhaps of what they have to pay. But if this measure is to go into operation——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for a division before this speech-making we are now having. I ask for a division on the vote.

Mr. DOLPH. I have already called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know; but he has not got it under the rules. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, if this distribution is to be commenced——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order, that when a vote commences we have a right to continue to the end of that vote.

Mr. PLUMB. No, except when a question is being taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask now for a division, and when that is declared I have a right to ask for the yeas and nays, and I mean to do both. I am not unprepared to be ruled out of order, because I perfectly understand that while we have a book here called Rules, its contents rule nobody; but I do ask now that we shall have a division.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the question debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. HARRIS. So I thought.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGBR. Therefore, I say the Senator from Kansas is out of order, and we are entitled to a division on the question.

Mr. PLUMB. I submit the point of order to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor. The chair decides that the question is open to debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I will debate that, if it is debatable. If it is not debatable, I do not make the appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear what the Senator from Virginia has to say, and perhaps he can convince the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to know from the Chair whether I am in or out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Virginia is out of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the Chair hold that an appeal from the decision of the Chair is not debatable on this question, and yet allow the Senator from Kansas to debate what is not before the Senate except on a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the question of the appeal the Chair will hear the Senator and submit the question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not want that, sir. I want to know whether I am in or out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has twice decided that the Senator from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And the Senator from Virginia yields under protest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that we ought not to have, as I was about to say, the distribution of this money until there is some evidence that it is to be distributed in that general way which the bill contemplates. Unless this money is to be applied generally to the cause of education in the Southern States, I take it that there will be no use in entering on any expenditure under the bill at all. What kind of a position should we be assuming here if we should say that the State of Alabama alone of all the States to be benefited by the bill should accept the money and no other State should accept it? Would any one say we ought to enter upon the subject of education in the State of Alabama and not in the other Southern States? Would any one say that we ought to enter upon the subject of education in any of the States unless we entered upon it in them all?

What little there is left of the Constitution I think would seem to indicate that if we do this business at all we ought to do it generally, for the benefit of all the children of school age in the United States, and not simply for the benefit of those in one State. But if some such proposition as that offered by the Senator from Oregon is not adopted we may find ourselves in just this condition, that we have made an appropriation for one State or for two States and for no more, because the others fail or decline to accept it. What reason, therefore, for declining——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will please state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I make the point of order that when there is a vote called for that is viva voce, any Senator on this floor has a right to call for a division. I called for it; I called for it in a tone that the President of the Senate could not have failed to hear, and calling for that division it is first to be taken, and there can be no debate ensuing between the mere declaration of a viva voce vote by the Chair and the call for a division. If it be otherwise, then there can be no end to any debate here.

If this bill is to be delayed again in this way I want it known who delays it. I want it known that the President of the Senate is not recognizing the rule, so far as I have a right to expound it here in the Senate. I say that when you undertake to take a vote here there are three things to do. One is for the Chair to submit it to a viva voce vote, next to a division, and next to the yeas and nays, and between those votes there can be no debate except that which violates every rule that governs parliamentary bodies from the time that the first one was inaugurated. That is my position.

I say now, sir, that I asked for a division on this vote, and I ask for it now. I repeat it now, and when that vote is taken I shall have a right to ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays.

There is no such thing in this body as the previous question; there is nothing to cut off debate; but there is such a rule as says that any Senator may call for a viva voce vote, then for a division, and after that for the yeas and nays. I want it distinctly understood that I have asked for that; and now, if the Senator from Kansas, who is employing every method to beat this bill, shall be allowed, in violation of every principle of parliamentary government or parliamentary form, to make another speech, I want it known that the responsibility lies between him and the President of the Senate.

I insist upon my right to a division of the Senate on the question after the Chair declared that the proposition had failed and was lost. After that I shall insist upon my right to the yeas and nays, and I do not believe that there is a parliamentarian in this body who will not say that it is my right to ask for these things. We have no previous question. I only ask, therefore, that we shall have the vote taken in its proper order: first, viva voce; second, on a division; and, third, by the yeas and nays.

I have heard it stated and I have seen it printed that what I asserted in the Senate was generally sat down upon. I care not for that, knowing, as I think I know, that I am right. I am struggling for the passage of this bill, and I am going to continue to struggle for it under the rules of the Senate; and, sir, you can not take from that desk the book that ought to control you and find within it a rule which justifies your rulings a while ago. I say that it is my right, as it is the right of every Senator here, after a vote is taken viva voce, to ask for a division, and then that one-fifth of the vote thus taken may proclaim that there shall be a vote by yeas and nays on the call of any Senator who makes it.

I say therefore that I ask for a division. I am entitled to it. I care not to be ruled down under it, but I assert the right because I know it is my right under the rule.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be allowed to state his position.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia must be aware that the question was plainly put by the Chair and plainly decided, and the Chair announced that decision in a distinct voice. The Senator from Kansas then rose and took the floor to debate the bill. The Senator from Virginia did not call for a division; he did not call for the yeas and nays——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; I did not, if the Chair will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will please not interrupt the Chair.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia did not call for a division; he did not call for the yeas and nays; but when the Senator from Kansas was advancing in his argument on the bill he then rose and demanded a division. It was too late. The Chair wishes kindly but firmly to say to the Senator from Virginia that he has not sought to discriminate against him in the slightest degree; the Senator is mistaken in that; but on the contrary the Chair has often done the reverse; and he appeals to the Senator from Virginia to withdraw the imputation that the Chair ever discriminated against him or sought to deprive him of his rights. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Chair will permit me, I did not mean to say that the Chair had discriminated against me; I meant to say that the Chair himself did not comprehend the rule. That is exactly what I meant to say. I meant to say that whenever a vote is proposed to be taken there are three ways in which to take it, first, to ask for a viva voce vote, and that no debate can ensue between that and the right of any Senator to call for a division; and that no debate can ensue between that and the right to call for the yeas and nays; and the man who does not comprehend that I say does not comprehend the rules of a parliamentary body.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that motion will not be made.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, no; let us finish the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. We can not finish the bill to-night.

Mr. DOLPH. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. Before that motion is put, as I have been out of the Senate Chamber, will the Chair kindly state what is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator from Kansas will give way to me for a moment to state my point of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I will do so.

Mr. DOLPH. The question was on my amendment, and I rose in time and called for the yeas and nays. It is possible the Chair did not hear me. Before the Senator from Kansas took the floor I called for the yeas and nays, and expected the Chair to ask if there was a second to that call. I suppose I was right in doing that without calling for a division first. I desired a full vote of the Senate on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon say that before the Senator from Kansas rose he called for the yeas and nays?

Mr. DOLPH. I certainly did. I think the Senators around me will bear me out in that. I know the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the word of the Senator on that point, because if he called for the yeas and nays before the Senator from Kansas was recognized he is clearly entitled to them.

Mr. DOLPH. I certainly did.

Mr. PLUMB. I certainly designed to do the same thing. I was discussing the amendment of the Senator from Oregon with no suspicion that it had been defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Oregon called for the yeas and nays the Chair will submit that question.

Mr. DOLPH. I did.

Mr. PLUMB. I renew my motion.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. HOAR. Let the yeas and nays be ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion for the purpose of having the yeas and nays ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I move that the Senate proceed——

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the friends of the bill will continue the discussion longer.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer, as I did yesterday, two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not care to interfere with the Senator from Oregon, but I desire that my amendments shall be considered as offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. I renew the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide; and the ayes were 29.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] have both gone away on committee work, and I believe are paired with each other.

Mr. HOAR. Before the vote is declared I desire to ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment and those of which notice has been given may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the announcement of the vote, the Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to have an order made that certain amendments be printed.

Mr. HOAR. That the pending amendment and those of which notice has been given may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 22; as follows:

The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 2, 1886.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is made the constitutional duty of the President to recommend to the consideration of the Congress, from time to time, such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. In no matters can the necessity of this be more evident than when the good faith of the United States under the solemn obligation of treaties with foreign powers is concerned.

The question of the treatment of the subjects of China sojourning within the jurisdiction of the United States presents such a matter for the urgent and earnest consideration of the Executive and the Congress.

In my first annual message, upon the assembling of the present Congress, I adverted to this question in the following words:

"The harmony of our relations with China is fully sustained.

"In the application of the acts lately passed to execute the treaty of 1880, restrictive of the immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States, individual cases of hardship have occurred beyond the power of the Executive to remedy, and calling for judicial determination.

"The condition of the Chinese question in the Western States and Territories is, despite this restrictive legislation, far from being satisfactory. The recent outbreak in Wyoming Territory, where numbers of unoffending Chinamen, indisputably within the protection of the treaties and the law, were murdered by a mob, and the still more recent threatened outbreak of the same character in Washington Territory are fresh in the minds of all, and there is apprehension lest the bitterness of feeling against the Mongolian race on the Pacific slope may find vent in similar lawless demonstrations. All the power of this Government should be exerted to maintain the amplest good faith toward China in the treatment of these men, and the inflexible sternness of the law in bringing the wrongdoers to justice should be insisted upon.

"Every effort has been made by this Government to prevent these violent outbreaks and to aid the representatives of China in their investigation of these outrages; and it is but just to say that they are traceable to the lawlessness of men not citizens of the United States, engaged in competition with Chinese laborers.

"Race prejudice is the chief factor in originating these disturbances, and it exists in a large part of our domain, jeopardizing our domestic peace and the good relationship we strive to maintain with China.

"The admitted right of a Government to prevent the influx of elements hostile to its internal peace and security may not be questioned, even where there is no treaty stipulation on the subject. That the exclusion of Chinese labor is demanded in other countries where like conditions prevail is strongly evident in the Dominion of Canada, where Chinese immigration is now regulated by laws more exclusive than our own. If existing laws are inadequate to compass the end in view, I shall be prepared to give earnest consideration to any further remedial measures, within the treaty limits, which the wisdom of Congress may devise."

At the time I wrote this the shocking occurrences at Rock Springs, in Wyoming Territory, were fresh in the minds of all, and had been recently presented anew to the attention of this Government by the Chinese minister in a note which, while not unnaturally exhibiting some misconception of our Federal system of administration in the Territories while they as yet are not in the exercise of the full measure of that sovereign self-government pertaining to the States of the Union, presents in truthful terms the main features of the cruel outrage there perpetrated upon inoffensive subjects of China. In the investigation of the Rock Springs outbreak and the ascertainment of the facts on which the Chinese minister's statements rest the Chinese representatives were aided by the agents of the United States, and the reports submitted, having been thus framed and recounting facts within the knowledge of witnesses on both sides, possess an impartial truthfulness which could not fail to give them great impressiveness.

The facts, which so far are not controverted or affected by any exculpatory or mitigating testimony, show the murder of a number of Chinese subjects in September last, at Rock Springs, the wounding of many others, and the spoliation of the property of all when the unhappy survivors had been driven from their habitations. There is no allegation that the victims by any lawless or disorderly act on their part contributed to bring about a collision; on the contrary, it appears that the law-abiding disposition of these people who were sojourners in our midst under the sanction of hospitality and express treaty obligations was made the pretext for the attack upon them. This outrage upon law and treaty engagements was committed by a lawless mob. None of the aggressors, happily for the national good fame, appear by the reports to have been citizens of the United States. They were aliens engaged in that remote district as mining laborers, who became excited against the Chinese laborers, as it would seem, because of their refusal to join them in a strike to secure higher wages. The oppression of Chinese subjects by their rivals in the competition for labor does not differ in violence and illegality from that applied to other classes of native or alien labor. All are equally under the protection of law and equally entitled to enjoy the benefits of assured public order.

Were there no treaty in existence referring to the rights of Chinese subjects; did they come hither as all other strangers who voluntarily resort to this land of freedom, of self-government, and of laws, here peaceably to win their bread and to live their lives, there can be no question that they would be entitled still to the same measure of protection from violence and the same free forum for the redress of their grievances as any other aliens.

So far as the treaties between the United States and China stipulate for the treatment of the Chinese subjects actually in the United States as the citizens or subjects of "the most favored nation" are treated, they create no new status for them; they simply recognize and confirm a general and existing rule, applicable to all aliens alike, for none are favored above others by domestic law, and none by foreign treaties unless it be the Chinese themselves in some respects. For by the third article of the treaty of November 17, 1880, between the United States and China, it is provided that:

"ARTICLE III. If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty."

This article may be held to constitute a special privilege for Chinese subjects in the United States, as compared with other aliens; not that it creates any peculiar rights which others do not share, but because, in case of ill treatment of the Chinese in the United States, this Government is bound to "exert all its power to devise measures for their protection," by securing to them the rights to which equally with any and all other foreigners they are entitled.

Whether it is now incumbent upon the United States to amend their general laws or devise new measures in this regard I do not consider in the present communication, but confine myself to the particular point raised by the outrage and massacre at Rock Springs.

The note of the Chinese minister and the documents which accompany it give, as I believe, an unexaggerated statement of the lamentable incident, and present impressively the regretable circumstance that the proceedings, in the name of justice, for the ascertainment of the crime and fixing the responsibility therefor were a ghastly mockery of justice. So long as the Chinese minister, under his instructions, makes this the basis of an appeal to the principles and convictions of mankind, no exception can be taken. But when he goes further, and, taking as his precedent the action of the Chinese Government in past instances where the lives of American citizens and their property in China have been endangered, argues a reciprocal obligation on the part of the United States to indemnify the Chinese subjects who suffered at Rock Springs, it became necessary to meet his argument, and to deny most emphatically the conclusions he seeks to draw as to the existence of such a liability and the right of the Chinese Government to insist upon it.

I draw the attention of the Congress to the latter part of the note of the Secretary of State of February 18, 1886, in reply to the Chinese minister's representations, and invite especial consideration of the cogent reasons by which he reaches the conclusion that, whilst the United States Government is under no obligation—whether by the express terms of its treaties with China or the principles of international law—to indemnify these Chinese subjects for losses caused by such means and under the admitted circumstances, yet that in view of the palpable and discreditable failure of the authorities of Wyoming Territory to bring to justice the guilty parties or to assure to the sufferers an impartial forum in which to seek and obtain compensation for the losses which those subjects have incurred by lack of police protection, and considering further the entire absence of provocation or contribution on the part of the victims, the Executive may be induced to bring the matter to the benevolent consideration of the Congress, in order that that body, in its high discretion, may direct the bounty of the Government in aid of innocent and peaceful strangers whose maltreatment has brought discredit upon the country; with the distinct understanding that such action is in no wise to be held as a precedent, is wholly gratuitous, and is resorted to in a spirit of pure generosity toward those who are otherwise helpless.

The correspondence exchanged is herewith submitted for the information of the Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 2, 1886.

SALARY OF DEPUTY COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency relative to the inadequacy of the salary of the deputy comptroller of the currency, and recommending that it be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYOR-GENERAL OF ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a revised estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for salaries in the office of surveyor-general of Arizona for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, asking that the unexpended balance of appropriation for improving the Capitol grounds for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, be reappropriated for the current fiscal year, and that authority be given to pay the claim of Middleton, Lane & Co. for work on the Capitol terraces; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORT MISSOULA MILITARY RESERVATION, MONTANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting plats and correspondence showing the status of certain lands in the military reservation at Fort Missoula, Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior relative to an appropriation for repairs of the adobe palace. Sante Fé, N. Mex., and to an increase of the salary of the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, also laid before the House Senate bills and a concurrent resolution; which were read a first and second time, and referred as follows, namely:

Joint resolution (S. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States—to the Committee on Printing.

The bill (S. 1653) to forward a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad—to the Committee on Printing.

Senate concurrent resolution relative to printing a list of awards made under treaties with France and Spain—to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, for ten days, from the 25th of February, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the standing and select committees of the House for reports.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back with favorable recommendations Senate bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; which were severally referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed, namely:

A bill (S. 141) to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to the port of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (S. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; and

Joint resolution (S. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER, LITTLE FALLS, MINN.

Mr. BYNUM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4063) to authorize the improvement of the water-power of the Mississippi River at Little Falls, Minn.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAPE ORFORD LIGHT-STATION.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3232) making an appropriation for the purchase of a right of way to Cape Orford light-station, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3933) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRAGG, by unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House bills and a memorial of the Oregon Legislature of the following titles; which were severally referred, as follows, namely:

The bill (H. R. 3238) to amend section 4700 of the Revised Statutes relating to invalid pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 4602) to amend an act to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, asking for legislation to investigate alleged fraudulent selection, location, and patenting of those military wagon-road grants from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of Oregon, and also that one from Dalles City, in Oregon, by way of Camp Watson, Canyon City, and Mormon Basin, to Snake River, opposite Fort Boisé, in Idaho Territory—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FORT WORTH AND DENVER CITY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WELLBORN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 2407, a bill (H. R. 6393) to authorize the Fort Worth and Denver City Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Does this bill make an appropriation of money or property of the United States?

Mr. WELLBORN. It is a bill to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory, and I think should properly be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does it dispose of any property belonging to the United States?

Mr. WELLBORN. I can not say that it does. There have been two precedents, however, and in both cases it was considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It will be sent there without objection; but the Chair thinks that if it does not appropriate money or property of the United States it should go properly to the House Calendar.

Mr. WELLBORN. I have no objection to that reference.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 2407 was ordered to be laid on the table.

SAC AND FOX AND IOWA INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 6394) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN DUBACH.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 704) granting a pension to Benjamin Dubach; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZA A. WEEKS.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Eliza A. Weeks; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 4543) granting a pension to David Sarsfield; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

J. R. MARTIN.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 707) for the relief of J. R. Martin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. MORAN.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3547) for the relief of William P. Moran; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS B. M'ELWEE.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3699) for the relief of Thomas B. McElwee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUSAN A. WAMACK.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3998) for the relief of Susan A. Wamack, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABBIE SHARP.

Mr. McKENNA, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3361) for the relief of Abbie Sharp, formerly Abbie Gardner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 3521) for the relief of Joseph W. McClurg; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN PLATTE COUNTY, MISSOURI.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 218) to confirm title to certain lands in Platte County, Missouri, and authorize patents to be issued therefor to Kinsey B. Cecil; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MANAGEMENT OF PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department to report back with the recommendation that it be adopted the resolution which I send to the desk. It is not a privileged report. I am also authorized to ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done under this call.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be instructed to investigate the expenditure and management of the Pension Bureau during the present and previous administrations, and also to ascertain and report to the House what foundation there is for the statement in the annual report of Commissioner Black in reference to partisan management and extravagance of that bureau during the terms of office of his predecessors, with power to send for persons and papers, and compel the attendance of witnesses.

The resolution was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PILOT LAWS.

The Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests was called.

Mr. HAMMOND. I was not in the House yesterday when the bill (H. R. 6390) relating to pilotage was reported from this committee. I ask leave to present the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Georgia will have leave to present the views of the minority on the bill he has indicated and they will be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection.

TESTS OF IRON, STEEL, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at ten minutes after 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] had the floor on the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 5555.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5555) authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures and deduce useful rules therefrom.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. McMILLIN. When the hour for the consideration of this business expired yesterday I had stated to the House that the Government had constructed a machine at Watertown for the testing of metals; that that machine was constructed at great cost; that the Government had magnanimously opened it to the use of private individuals, not upon payment of any part of the cost of the machine or of its wear and tear, but simply on payment of the expense of operating it while it was being used by such individuals. It has seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, that was all that a citizen could reasonably ask of the Government.

It is known by those who have kept the run of the appropriations of Congress that the sum of $10,000 a year is appropriated for the purpose of keeping up and running this machine. The individuals that get the benefit of it are not required even to reimburse the Government for that. But now, not content with paying the pittance that is required for the use of the machine, there is a proposition before Congress to appoint a commission to do the work for these individuals free from all cost; and the question is whether the masses of the people of the United States should be required to pay this cost.

I for one do not believe they should. This bill appropriates $25,000; but it is the intention of its framers that this shall be a perpetual institution, that another permanent commission shall be established, and possibly that, after budding for a while as a commission, it shall bloom out into a full-blown bureau. That will be the result of the legislation which we are entering on to-day. Why do I say that it is to be perpetual? Listen to this provision in the fourth section of the bill: "That said commission shall make, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, a report," &c. Does that look as if it were to be temporary? Is any man here so deluded as to suppose that it is to be temporary and that by any possibility it can be made so? Who ever saw a bureau die in Washington, and how many commissions even have been seen to expire? Now, to show that the object is to enable individuals to get their work done without cost to them I will read a portion of another section of the bill. Section 3 provides "that manufacturers of iron and steel and other structural materials who may request tests of their productions shall file with the commission a full and detailed statement of the mode and process of manufacture," and so on. What other object is there in this bill? None whatever.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Who makes the tests now?

Mr. McMILLIN. Tests are made now, so far as the Government desires tests, by officials of the Government, and then, under the general law, this machine (which cost more than $50,000 and for which $10,000 are annually appropriated to pay the expense of running and keeping it up) is turned over to individuals, who are allowed to make tests for their own purposes by paying simply the expense of running the machine.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Do I understand that the Government built the present machine and paid for it?

Mr. McMILLIN. The Government built the machine and carries an annual appropriation, as I remember, of $10,000 to keep it up and run it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. One more question. The reports which have been made by the Government of course cover about the same ground that is proposed to be covered by the reports of this commission.

Mr. McMILLIN. Reports have been made by the Government. I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] about that yesterday, and his answer will answer the question of the gentleman from Kansas. My question was, "Is it not a fact that the results of these tests are now published, and all parties can get the benefit of them if they wish to do so?" That, I think, is the point in regard to which the gentleman from Kansas desires information. The gentleman from New York answered, "They are published the same as many other things are published, by the scientific schools." So it seems this information is within reach of all parties who make an effort to get it.

Mr. LONG. May I call the gentleman's attention to a provision within this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield to my friend for that purpose.

Mr. LONG. Does not the bill provide that the information which this commission is intended to obtain shall be limited to such persons as the Secretary of the Interior may authorize or direct?

Mr. McMILLIN. Is the gentleman speaking of a limitation under the present law?

Mr. LONG. I am speaking of the limitation provided in this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The provisions of the bill are before all the members of this House, and they can judge of them as well as I can.

Mr. LONG. But is it not true that this information is not to be open to the public at large or to every individual who seeks it, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, but is to be subject entirely to the control of the Secretary of the Interior; in other words, to the control of the Government itself?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is to be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior; but I call my friend's attention to the third section of the bill. I have read a line of it, but now I will read it all, and if it does not mean that individuals are to get the benefit of this information at the expense of the Government, then it is nonsense and means nothing. I read the third section of the bill:

SEC. 3. That manufacturers of iron, steel, and other structural materials who may request tests of their productions shall file with the commission a full and detailed statement of the mode and process of manufacture of such production, also giving the name and character of each of the original ingredients and the proportion which the component parts entering into such production bear to each other.

Mr. Chairman, when stripped of verbiage and shown exactly as it is, this bill is merely designed to enable private parties to get their metals tested and get information at public expense. The Government already tests its metals; it has a machine for that purpose; and if the Government wishes to disseminate information concerning any of these tests, what has it to do but detail one of its engineers or other scientific employés for the purpose of making reports upon the subject? I have no objection to as many tests as may be required; but I do protest against the Government of the United States being encumbered with the cost of tests that are intended for the benefit of private individuals. I see nothing that is desirable provided for in this bill that can not be obtained with the testing-machine we now have under the laws which now control its use—nothing.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. With what greater efficiency will tests be made under the commission provided for in this bill than they are made now?

Mr. McMILLIN. I am unable to state. I will say to my friend from Maine that I am unable to see why there would be any increase of efficiency. We have schools of engineers; we have scientific men educated at our Naval and Military Academies. Is it possible that we are running those two institutions at the great expense which they annually put upon the country, and yet that we have no material graduated from them which is qualified to superintend and report upon scientific work of this kind? If so, our vast expenditures have been unprofitably made. I think that it can be done under this bill. It is true that the appointment of this commission is to involve no expenditure except what may be allowed to the employés and to one principal expert, and except, further, that mileage and expenses are to be allowed to the members of the commission. We all know what bills come in when provisions of this kind are made. Very probably the most expensive appropriations in the way of pay that Congress makes are those where officers' only salary is the pay for all the traveling they can do and all the feasting they can get. That sort of thing is generally very expensive to the Government.

I now yield fifteen minutes to my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, in its general features this bill is calculated to mislead the House into the idea that this is a very small affair; but in point of fact its proportions are exceedingly great, as will be found by looking at the details. The committee themselves in their report say that—

The object of this bill is the creation of a commission of experts to ascertain and make public the strength and other properties of materials used in structures upon a scale beyond that which can be carried out by private means, information rendered necessary by the requirements of the present and increasing developments of the future.

The work to be done is of the greatest importance. Its object is to secure information which will result in more economical construction, in increased safety for life, and in the more assured protection of much valuable governmental and private property now dangerously liable to accident and destruction.

The bill itself in its very terms declares that the commission "shall plan and superintend the execution of such tests and investigations of materials used extensively in the construction of buildings, bridges, ships, and other structures and machinery as the Secretary of the Interior shall authorize and direct." I ask members of the committee to bear in mind the scope of this language: "bridges, buildings, ships, and other structures and machinery." The third section provides—

That manufacturers of iron, steel, and other structural materials who may request tests of their productions shall file with the commission a full and detailed statement of the mode and process of manufacture of such production, also giving the name and character of each of the original ingredients and the proportion which the component parts entering into such production bear to each other.

It is provided in the fourth section that this commission "shall make, on or before the 1st of December in each year, a report to the Secretary of the Interior, containing a full and detailed statement of its work, of the results of the tests and investigations made by it, and also of such scientific principles and practical rules deduced therefrom as it shall consider most useful, which report shall be transmitted by the Secretary to Congress."

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, with the view of showing that the operations of this commission will be properly limited, asks whether this matter will not be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and whether that officer may not be trusted to restrain properly the operations of the commission. But, sir, suppose (it is a violent supposition) that the Secretary of the Interior shall undertake to go into details and determine for himself how far the work of this commission shall go, how will he be guided? Will he not look to the terms of this bill? Will he not see in the very section giving him jurisdiction a provision that this commission shall examine all questions as to materials entering into the construction of "buildings, bridges, ships, and other structures and machinery," and will he not attempt to give full effect to the will of Congress as thus expressed? And if the Secretary of the Interior shall apprehend the scope of this measure as it appears to the gentleman from Tennessee and myself (and I presume to most of the other gentlemen here), may we not expect an immense organization in the shape of a new bureau?

Sir, there is nothing more delusive than a provision of this kind, that the Secretary of the Interior or some other Cabinet officer shall direct operations of this sort. Any gentleman with any knowledge of public affairs knows that it is impossible for any Cabinet official, charged with the administration of a great Department of the Government, to enter into questions of detail like those involved here. It is physically impossible for any such officer to do this; and no one with a knowledge of public affairs will suppose that a public officer can undertake to exercise control in such matters. In my judgment, therefore, this bill is to be treated as though this limitation were not contained in it; and this being so, it will come at last——

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. In the judgment of the gentleman himself, was not the building of this testing-machine, to which reference has been made, one of the best expenditures of money ever made by the United States, with reference to its benefits both to the General Government and also to private parties in the construction of bridges and various machinery upon which the safety of human life depends? Have not the benefits of this machine to the General Government and to the public paid for the expense of its construction a hundred times over?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, turning from this bill to answer my friend's question, I will say I am one of those individuals who believe that Congress is not required to do everything; that the people of this country, if allowed to do some things for themselves, will do them better than under Government direction.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But they have not done this particular thing up to the present time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the expense of devising and experimenting with machinery for the purpose of testing the strength of iron and steel, which are constantly used in the construction of bridges, machinery, &c.—the making of a thorough scientific research in reference to such a matter is really beyond the financial ability of private individuals.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, my friend's sentences in this connection are very attractive; but I can not dismiss from my mind the statement made on this floor that this machine cost the Government $50,000, and that there is an appropriation of $10,000 for this purpose in the sundry civil bill. To tell me that an expenditure of $50,000 for the original construction of a machine and $10,000 a year in the way of a subsequent appropriation is not within the reach of the capital of private individuals is simply ignoring the vast amount of capital always ready to be turned in such directions.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will allow me to say that the building of engines and the various tests of iron and steel in connection with the results which have been attained could not possibly have been accomplished except under the direction of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will ask if it refers to these bridge structures which we have built?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield to a speech, but I have no objection to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to have my speech framed in yours.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to its going there.

Mr. ROGERS. Although a little thin and copious. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from New York asks me the question whether I do not believe good would come to the Government from the use of a testing-machine. Well, sir, the Government has already a testing-machine without the passage of any such bill, and that testing-machine answers all the purposes of the Government. There is no pretense that it does not. If there were, I would join my friend and go further in order to supply the Government with all the information which may be required. But that is not what this bill seeks. It seeks to furnish every manufacturing establishment of this country, at the Government expense, every builder in the country, with the means of testing the material which he may use in the structures which he may erect. It is an exceedingly expensive plan which is suggested, and one which goes far beyond anything which was understood or thought of when the present scheme was begun. Even the Government itself, with the present testing-machine, is not going to the length proposed by this bill in the largeness and extent of the test to be applied.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Government is amply supplied with all the facilities for testing this material we have just as well secured the protection of the Government. But that is not all that is sought for by the passage of this bill. It is not alone for the benefit of the Government. It is also for the purpose of giving, as I have already stated, as the bill in several sections indicates, the opportunity to manufacturers and builders to have all the materials used in the construction of bridges, ships, and buildings tested, not at their own expense, but at the expense of the public.

Mr. LONG. Do you not think it would be for the benefit of the people?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Ask him what part of the people.

Mr. LONG. The great body of the people whose lives are at stake.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think it would be. I answer unequivocally in my judgment it does not, but that on the contrary there is no iniquity in legislation greater than an attempt on the part of private citizens of the United States to come into this House and use the public Treasury for the purpose merely of advancing their own individual interests. The capital invested in these manufactures is amply sufficient to make all the necessary tests of the material which may be used. It is an outrage, in my judgment, to seek to use the money of the Government not for the benefit of the Government, but for merely private and individual benefit.

Mr. CURTIN. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIN. If it is not for the protection of the people whose ingenuity and capital are invested in the production of these materials used in the construction of bridges, ships, and buildings, then what is this Government for? If it is not for their protection, what else has it to do?

Mr. BLOUNT. For their protection! I understand there are several kinds of protection, and I do not know which one the gentleman means.

Mr. CURTIN. I do. Anything that encourages the American people in the development of their interests, in their industries, in their productions, in the protection of human life by supplying tests of iron and steel, which now so largely enter into the economy of our progress as a people.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the people answer for some purposes themselves. They have their relations in society. If they are allowed to take care of themselves, they will succeed in the future as they have already done in the past in doing so without Government aid. But for a mere fraction of the people to come in and ask for a benefit claiming to be the whole people is something which I can not assent to.

Mr. CURTIN. I presume not; we get our wages for coming here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to give my friend time to interrupt me as much as he pleases or to any other gentleman, but I occupy the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and he has limited me, and therefore I will ask to be allowed to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he will not yield to me further time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will yield five minutes longer to the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. That will make seven minutes in all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not consent then to be further interrupted, as I need the time for myself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with a view of enticing us into the passage of this bill, they propose to make a small matter of the expense. Let us see how that is. Among other things this commission is to have the right to employ a principal expert and such other assistants and laborers as they may see fit. You prescribe the employés in every Department of the Government, but the employés under this commission are left absolutely to the discretion of the commissioners to determine upon what scale the organization shall take place.

Again, it contains a provision permitting this commission to purchase such material for its uses and investigations as it may from time to time require. They shall determine, under the provisions of the bill, what purchases to make, and the only limitation is that no liability shall be incurred until Congress finally makes an appropriation therefor.

Mr. Chairman, we all know how misleading and delusive such restrictive propositions are. I remember one commission that was created here, the National Board of Health, to which we gave $500,000 to be used in emergency; and before they had been in existence six months they came in and asked for a deficiency of $800,000.

You have provided that this commission, consisting of these learned and scientific men, shall have no compensation. You place upon them the superintendence and care of this work, the benefits of which gentlemen seem to take delight in placing before us in a strain that they fancy will catch the ear of the whole people of this land; this commission is to do all of the work, to abandon the consideration of all other business which may interfere (for it is evident that this must occupy their time), and yet they are to do it without compensation. You may find manufacturers interested in forwarding the scheme who will take the position with a view to ingrafting the benefits to be derived from it upon their private business establishments; but the Government, I maintain, can not hope, or reasonably ask even, that scientific men who are capable of being charged with such work as will devolve upon them under this bill shall be expected to do it for absolutely nothing.

Mr. HEWITT. They did it before.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from New York says they did it before. Ten thousand dollars——

Mr. HEWITT. No, they have not been paid anything for their services.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not say that they have been paid. Ten thousand dollars a year has been heretofore used in operating this machine.

Mr. HEWITT. Well, they do not get compensation for their services.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must beg leave to decline interruptions. I would yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] with equal readiness that I would yield to any gentleman upon the floor if I had the time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are entering upon the organization of a service which has no system developed. You do not know, you can not imagine its scope. You are falling into a trap in the terms of this bill, which pretends that while on the one hand its beneficial results are to reach out all over the land, blessing all of our people in a thousand different ways, yet on the other hand it is expected that this is to be done at an expenditure which will reach about $25,000 per annum.

Sir, how fallacious this is I need not say. It is simply absurd; it is not to be hoped for, nor is it in keeping with any experience we have had in reference to any other branch of the public service.

Take any bureau, no matter how humble it was at the beginning, no matter how simple it started, and trace its growth during the years, and see how gigantic has been its strides. I remember when the Fish Commission first started. In the Forty-fourth Congress a small expenditure had been made. The committee were called upon for about $16,000, and voted it upon some prior appropriation, making about $70,000 in all. It has gone on until its annual expenditures go up into the hundreds of thousands. I remember the organization of the Geological Survey of the Territories, which was regarded as a sort of band-box concern, whose expenditures have since grown fivefold and have magnified themselves until it has reached enormous proportions, requiring an expenditure of half a million dollars yearly.

And so, Mr. Chairman, you might go on with a long list of each one of these various bureaus and the same experience will be the result, and the gentlemen who are fathering this measure would not give a shekel for the bill if they did not calculate on its growth, if they did not know of its certain growth; and judging of the future by the past their anticipations are well founded. Let us not be deceived, sir. If the House means to create an enormous bureau with unusual powers to fasten itself on the vitals of the people, let us do it with our eyes open and not be willfully deceived.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed from the reading of this bill that it is a measure providing for a commission and one having less relation to the Government of the United States than any which has been yet established. Indeed, no provision of this bill connects the commission with the Government at all except the provision that the commissioners to be appointed under it shall be selected by the President. The expert and his subordinates are approved of by the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior approves the expenditures or the bills which may be made by the commission. The exception goes in these respects, as far as I have been able to understand the bill, to that extent only, as far as it has reference and relation to the Government, and beyond that it has no relation to it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It has relation to the people of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has no relation to the Government. It is of all commissions which has been suggested to the Congress the most completely outside of and beyond the Government. A more complete organization for private purposes never could have been suggested in Congress. A bureau with capacity in the very beginning to make unlimited appropriations and without any limitation as to duration (except at the pleasure of the President of the United States alone with power to fill vacancies) indefinitely——

Mr. LONG. But there is power in Congress to repeal.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only the power to repeal, I concede. What public duty does the commission perform? Not one under this bill.

All that it has done is to create a commission outside of the Government and appropriate $25,000 for the current year to meet its expenses.

To show, Mr. Chairman, how entirely foreign this enterprise is to the Government of the United States I ask that the present law providing for the use of the testing-machine which has been spoken of at Watertown arsenal may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Testing-machine, Watertown arsenal: For caring for, preserving, using, and operating United States testing-machine at Watertown arsenal, $10,000: Provided, That hereafter the tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes shall be continued, and report thereof shall be made to Congress: And provided further, That in making tests for private citizens the officer in charge may require payment in advance, and may use the funds so received in making such private tests, making full report thereon to the Chief of Ordnance, and the Chief of Ordnance shall give attention to such programme of tests as may be submitted to the American Society of Civil Engineers, and the record of such tests shall be furnished to said society, to be by them published at their own expense.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the Society of Civil Engineers are already connected with that testing-machine, but nowhere has this measure any relation to that machine so far as any words in the bill create such a relation. This is not a movement on behalf of the Government. It is not the organization of a bureau for the benefit of the Government. It is simply to carry out enterprises of private citizens and a class of citizens who are amply able to meet the expenses of their own enterprises.

Now, sir, for one I object to going any further in this matter of commissions than we have already gone, and especially commissions having no relation to the Government. You have now two commissions in existence drawing heavy salaries from the Government without any benefit to you whatever. The experience of this Government in commissions has not been favorable; and the organization of commissions outside of the Government irresponsible to the Government—and where is the responsibility here?—is not in harmony with our institutions.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. To what two commissions does the gentleman from Indiana refer?

Mr. HOLMAN. To the one connected with the improvements of the Lower Mississippi and the other in reference to the Missouri River. Each of them has some relations with the Government, but at the same time from the irresponsible character they are inefficient and unproductive of good results.

So far as the Government of the United States is concerned it has already ample facilities for testing all metals used in the construction of its ships or in the construction of its public buildings. This bill provides for the organization of a bureau of unlimited proportions with unlimited capacity for growth for private purposes alone, not for the purposes of the Government of the United States. I find this provision in the third section:

That the said commission is authorized to appoint a principal expert, who shall personally conduct the examinations and tests which the commission shall direct with such assistants and laborers.

A principle expert and such assistants and laborers as the commission may desire with the approval of the Secretary.

It is absolutely without limit as to the power of the building up of this bureau, beginning at the very outset with an enterprise outside of the Government—a bureau without limit of growth on the very face of the law itself. I object, for one, to the Government going into such schemes. It has occupation enough when it confines itself to the great purposes of the Government without entering into those great enterprises which belong to our people. You can not by the expenditure of moneys from your Treasury promote one interest, however great it may be, without doing it at the expense of the labor of a great multitude of people who are not benefited by that expenditure. I have said all I desire. I trust this committee will not favor the passage of this bill, but will leave something to this Government, to the energy and enterprise of our people, and not by special and partial legislation promote some interest at the expense of the whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN].

Mr. EDEN. The bill under consideration appears to be rather a harmless bill if we look merely at the surface of it, but when we come to examine it carefully we find there are some important principles involved in it.

The question is not presented as to whether the Government of the United States is to be provided with the means by which structural material can be tested. These means already exist, and the proposition of this bill is that tests shall be applied for private individuals and corporations at the expense of the Government of the United States; and in order to accomplish this purpose that a new bureau—because this is the foundation of establishing a new bureau—under the Government of the United States shall be set up for the purpose of carrying out not a purpose of the Government, but a purpose for the benefit of individuals.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] who spoke on yesterday stated that petitions of corporations representing $300,000,000 of capital are asking for the passage of this bill.

It is said that unless the Government provides the means private enterprise will not be able to apply these tests. I take it that these great corporations representing $300,000,000 of capital are amply able to apply all the tests that may be necessary to be applied in the machinery or in the material that they may be engaged in manufacturing for these purposes. There are testing-machines already in the country. This bill provides in a general way for the establishment of a commission unlimited by the terms of the bill as to the number of clerks and employés that shall be appointed.

I say it is unlimited by the terms of the bill. As a matter of course it is subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, but I say we ought not to establish a commission of this sort, where there is no purpose of the Government to be accomplished by it.

It is said that this testing-machine which the Government has already costs $25 a day to run it. I notice that statement in some of the speeches that have been made here. Now, if that be true, if the purpose of the gentlemen who are asking for the establishment of the commission proposed in this bill is to cast the burden of the expense of testing their material upon the Government of the United States, then it is wrong in principle, and this House ought to vote it down. I see from the report of the committee that the chief reason given for the passage of this bill is this: "The proposed commission would promote largely the interests of manufacturers, by indicating to them the value of the different methods of obtaining strength, and, of still greater moment, securing uniformity in their productions." It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States ought not to be at the expense of applying these tests simply for the benefit of private individuals or corporations, and that is the main ground upon which this bill rests. The Government of the United States does not need this commission. The Government is already provided with the means of making all necessary tests. It is not only provided with the means for making its own tests, but those tests are open to individuals who desire to use them. The second section of this bill provides "that the said commission is hereby authorized to appoint a principal expert." How much is that expert to be paid? This bill does not fix the amount of his compensation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nor does it contain any limitation of his term.

Mr. EDEN. No, the bill fixes no limit to his term and no limit to his pay. It simply provides that a principal expert shall be appointed, with such assistants and laborers as may be necessary, and leaves the compensation to be recommended by the commission and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCMILLIN resumed the floor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Claims in the last Congress I gathered some facts which may enable the present House to come to a correct conclusion on the merits of this bill. Not only did the Government of the United States pay $25,000, the original contract price, to a man named Emery, who agreed to construct this testing-machine, but it paid him about $30,000 more, so that the machine cost the Government in the neighborhood of $55,000.

The Government first paid the man what he had agreed to build the machine for, and, in addition to that, bore the expense of perfecting several additional inventions connected with it before it was completed, and after it was completed this man Emery took out patents for the improvements on the original design which the Government had in view at the time it entered into the first contract.

Besides that, he came forward in the last Congress and presented a claim against the Government for a very large amount, at least $200,000, for his severe mental effort and pretended cost of materials in perfecting this great testing-machine at Government expense.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Had he a patent on the original machine?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; he had no patent on the original design of the machine, but he has taken out patents on the improvements he made at Government expense. I remember asking him the question, "Will you assign your interest in the patents for the improvements on this machine to the Government if we agree to pay you the sum you now ask?" He replied, "I can not, because I have transferred them to a manufacturing company, which has been organized and will soon begin to build these machines for large private manufacturers in this country." And that, Mr. Chairman, is "the cat in the meal-tub."

The large manufacturers of steel and iron, the house-builders, bridge-builders, ship-builders, and the men who take contracts to erect great structures involving the use of strong materials, want to have their tests made upon this machine, either at the expense of the Government or of the patentee, or at the expense of both. No; this bill is brought forward either to bribe the patentee at Government expense or to coerce him. At present any one can have tests made upon the Government machine by simply defraying the expenses of running it. Nothing is charged for the use of it; but the large private manufacturers seek by this bill to compel the Government to run the machine also for their benefit, so that it shall cost them nothing to have any test made, and if in addition to this the patentee (Emery) can be employed about the Government machine at a big salary for an indefinite time he may be reconciled to charge only a small or no royalty on his patents; and if he refuses, then the manufacturers can get along very well anyhow by using the Government machine without any expense to them and in defiance of the patentee.

Suppose you pass this bill; what will be the result? Simply to make the United States a partner with every user and manufacturer of materials employed in the construction of ships, bridges, edifices, &c., and let the private partners get all the profits, while the Government shall bear all the expense. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] suggested, if this bill passes it will be the beginning of nothing more nor less than the organization of a huge bureau of applied chemistry and physics for the benefit of the public.

Mr. LONG. Do you object to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do object to it. The Government is not a college; and is the Government to attempt to play father for the people in everything? Is nothing to be left to the citizen? Do you want to bring us to a point of consolidation and centralization which will equal that of France, which led to her revolution? Manufacturers, contractors, and builders as a class are well able to take care of themselves, and the many should not be taxed for the benefit of the few.

Mr. Chairman, I know as well as any one the absolute necessity of testing, if it can be properly done, iron and steel and other substances that are to be used in important structures, for the simple reason that the ores out of which iron and steel particularly are made differ in almost every mine from which the ore is obtained. In scarcely any two mines have the ores the same amount of sulphur, or arsenic, or phosphorus, or other deleterious mixture, which, if not properly eliminated or counteracted, will serve to weaken the material and render it unfit for a special purpose. I appreciate that consideration; but are not such chemical, metallurgical, and mechanical difficulties incident to every branch of manufacture? And why should the Government set itself up as a gratuitous teacher and experimenter, or, as this bill proposes, as a partner in certain kinds of business? It would be a precedent for Government to engage in other business as a partner with the citizen, and there is no telling where it will stop.

Sir, even after science and art have exhausted all their best efforts to manufacture two Damascus swords, which may have been made, as it was thought, exactly alike—hammered the same length of time out of the same material—it is a well-known fact that one will break under a given test and the other will not. So, too, in the construction of bridges and of the various structures in which metal is used. Accidents will happen; and after human skill and effort have done their best there will be failures. Out of a dozen Collins axes some will be too hard, some too soft. Take two gun barrels, made exactly alike, at the same time, by the same man and by the same process—one will burst by use and the other will not. These things are incident to man's imperfection in knowledge and art. Such difficulties beset us at every step in life.

So far as has appeared necessary in mechanical and chemical industries, in the building of bridges, ships, and other structures, there have been thousands of general tests made, and even tests of the most important ores and materials, by every government in Europe and by this Government, as well as by many large manufacturing firms in this country; these tests are contained in formulas of scientific books, and are perhaps as nearly accurate as any that can be had in a general way. Let those who need special tests for specific ores or materials do the job for themselves, without looking to Government for assistance. I submit the Government should neither be a free-school teacher nor an experimenter for the benefit of a chosen few wealthy contractors and manufacturers, nor a partner with private individuals where the Government will foot all the bills and the private individuals get all the profits.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

TESTS OF IRON AND STEEL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has one minute remaining.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield that minute to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to take the gentleman from Arkansas off the floor; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] asked me if I had any time left to yield it to him. Of course I am grateful to the gentleman from Tennessee for yielding to me what time I have occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Arkansas desired an opportunity to offer an amendment, which I agreed to give him. Still, I have no feeling in the matter, and am entirely willing——

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield for the present; and if there should be any time left, I will occupy it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I yield one minute to my colleague [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, there is one proposition which has not been brought out with reference to this bill, and that is the fact——

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] was the gentleman who wanted the time; and my purpose was to yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. And he has yielded, as the Chair understands, to his colleague [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. ROGERS. If there is any time left after the gentleman gets through I will take it.

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to refer to one proposition which seems not to have been thoroughly understood——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] has expired. Two minutes of the hour remain.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to offer an amendment. I move to amend by striking out in the first section of the bill the words "during the pleasure of the President of the United States" and inserting "for the period of four years."

Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the appointment of seven officers of the Government, who are to have an ample allowance for their expenses, and who are to be invested with the large power (subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior) of appointing an expert without limit as to salary, as well as assistants and laborers, whose number and compensation the bill does not undertake to define. I trust, sir, we shall not at this time begin to multiply the civil employés of this Government who are to hold their offices without limit as to time. Four years constitute a reasonable term of office, and I should be glad to see this principle applied to every one of the employés of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will suspend his remarks. The hour for the consideration of this bill has expired; and the committee, under the rule, will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5555) authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts, skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures, and deduce useful rules therefrom, had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The bill first in order is the unfinished business, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORNEY. It is my purpose to yield the time assigned to me to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD].

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask to yield so much of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] as he may need to close his remarks begun yesterday if I can now be recognized for that purpose, say thirty minutes, at the end of which time the gentleman from Georgia can proceed, the remaining thirty minutes of my time to be reserved until further on in the debate.

Mr. NORWOOD. I am content with that understanding.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Very well, then. I will now take the floor and yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, when the hammer fell last night I was proceeding to say something touching the disclosures of the record as it has been made up with reference to the conduct of our political friends on the other side, and upon which they must base their claims to public confidence if they are entitled to it. It may be that there can be found occasionally an Araminta on this side and a gentleman on the other side who seem to think it is no part of the duty of a member on this floor to scan the record of either political party. What are records for? Is the record of a party—is the record of heroic events preserved only to breed forgetfulness? Do we learn any lessons except from passing events and the record of events which have passed? Do we shape our course for to-morrow except in the light of the experience of to-day, yesterday, and the day before? Sir, if records are only preserved to breed forgetfulness they are indeed needless.

I suggested yesterday that the intelligent patriot learns his duty in the light of experience and in the study of history. There are three kinds of patriots in the world. There is the commercial patriot, who realizes upon his patriotism on each election day. There is the physical patriot, the man who has indeed heroic courage, and who is strong and valiant in battle, but who has not the intelligence to understand that ideas, that principles make war; who has not the intelligence to understand that with the close of the physical strife in the arena of battle the conflict may be, and frequently is, only transferred to the arena of debate, and the contests continued in that arena are supplemented by the arbitrament of the ballot.

There is another patriot yet, who understands the teachings of history and the logic of events, who in studying the record of the last twenty-five years, nay, fifty, has come to understand what growing influences in this Republic must tend to make it strong and prosperous, and what other influences tend to drive it upon the shoals and rocks of dissolution. There are patriots who scorn to get into high places by shirking duty and dodging onerous and exacting public responsibilities.

There has been an intimation thrown out that I feel bitterly toward the gentlemen of the South. Why should I? Back through the years I trace my line with you. If there is anywhere in my make-up anything which prompts me to deprecate the prosperity or the triumph of any portion of my country achieved by honorable means, I hope it may be removed far from me. If there is in that same make-up anywhere to be found that which under any consideration can induce me to abate one jot or tittle from demanding what I believe to be due to my country, to its honor, to its integrity, to the great industries of the North and the West, I should feel that I deserved the contempt of all worthy men. I shall not, I hope, hesitate to speak plainly in defense of what is worthy, no matter what crosses I may be called upon to take up. I shall not, I trust, be deterred in my course by the doubtful smiles on the one side or suggestive frowns on the other. [Applause.]

The ashes of my ancestors sleep in old Virginia. My father left that State under a quickening sense that the Sermon on the Mount meant something; that the Nazarene meant to prescribe a just rule of conduct when he said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Under that healthful guiding influence multitudes left the slaveholding States and found new homes in the rich valleys of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and the great West, where their spirits were untrammeled and their lips free to bear witness to the truth as they were given to know it. And it is not from such homes that men come forth to engage in inconsiderate assaults upon their fellows for mere difference of opinion, or needlessly renew recollections and awaken memories that should, in deference to public tranquillity and private right, slumber forever.

I spoke yesterday of the means and instrumentalities to which the country is indebted for the present Democratic majority in this House. I spoke of it because it is a part of the written history of this country—a history that contains at once a lesson and a warning. If we fail to learn the one and neglect to heed the other in deference to a sickly sentimentality which compromises with wrong to avoid the wear and tear incident to a manly defense of the right, we must in the end pay the penalty which waits on such dereliction of duty.

Gentlemen of the South, I rejoice with you in your prosperity. Your States are all a part of our common country. But I must say I do not believe that that healthful love of country grows as rapidly in that soil as it ought to.

Mr. Chairman, two years ago I walked through the cemetery near Charleston, S. C., and stood amid the monuments that mark the resting-places of the dead. I read inscriptions upon a hundred of those monuments. Many recorded the heroism of the soldiers whose ashes slept beneath and attested with what valor they had strove in battle for the defense and glory of South Carolina, but of their country they were silent as the dead. From no inscription there could I learn that they who slept below had a country which reached beyond the borders of their State. Is that a hopeful sign, gentlemen upon the other side; is it a hopeful indication that there is a growing affection for the United States—an affection which reaches from ocean to ocean and from lake to gulf, that affection of which we hear you bear eloquent witness so often?

Gentlemen, you have a majority in this House; did it ever occur to you, my countrymen, that the methods by which you attained to that majority may yet come home to plague you? Did it ever occur to you of the Southern section that these examples might be practiced by a rising generation, and that to your undoing? You have heard that Eastern story:

> Of one whose skill
> Called demons up his water-casks to fill;
> Deftly and silently they did his will,
> But when they were full kept pouring still.
> In vain with spell and charm the wizard wrought,
> Faster and faster were the buckets brought;
> Higher and higher rose the flood around,
> Till the fiends clapped their hands above their master drowned.

So, too, it would be well to remember, and perhaps a time may come when you will remember, that the evils you have conjured up to serve you now may stay to torment you; which God forbid. The villainy you teach they may execute, and it may go hard but they better the instruction. There is a voice mightier than mine to teach, a voice you can hear if you listen well, which may whisper in your ear that it may be unwise to let pass unheeded the suggestions made in the behalf I have mentioned.

My friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] said, following the line of remark of my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE], "we are back in our father's house and are here to stay." That is possibly true. There is, in fact, too much reason to apprehend that it is in view of the agencies employed—employed, too, without rebuke.

Mr. HEWITT. Well, drive them out.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. He [Mr. WILSON] says, we are satisfied; well, I should naturally suppose they would be. They have the temple, and guard all the approaches. [Laughter.] "Drive them out," says my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT]. We know of but one method of driving anybody from service in this Hall, and that is by the honest exercise of the ballot.

Mr. HEWITT. That is what hurts.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You have felt dissatisfied, and are disposed to criticise this side of the House, because we were prompted, by what you affect to regard as want of charity, in voting solidly against you, on a bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. Of that bill, and the action of this House upon it, I submit that the annals of recorded time can not present its fellow.

Coriolanus led the legions of Rome to victory upon a hundred well-fought fields; but he afterward led the Volscians against the "Eternal City." Suppose he had captured Rome, and the Volscians had seated themselves about the Senate (and for the purpose of my illustration, gentlemen of the South, you are the Volscians and this is Rome), and they had proceeded not only to condone the treachery to Rome but to vote a reward for the betrayal of the Roman treasury, the scene enacted here would have had its parallel. Here we witnessed the reward of treachery, voted out of the treasury of the republic betrayed to the soldier guilty of that betrayal, and voted too by the men in whose interest that betrayal took place.

Now, I pass to another matter. I said yesterday that, posing as the friend of the great industries of this country and of the workers engaged therein, and assuming that they were safe under your protection, when charged with the duty of revising the tariff you failed to discharge that high duty, and when in the Forty-seventh Congress we addressed ourselves to that work you flew to the brakes and there by every means known to parliamentary law endeavored to hinder, retard, and, if possible, defeat the accomplishment of that work. But, nevertheless, it was finished, and the wheels of our great industries started, not by your help but in spite of your opposition.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. How did you vote in the Forty-eighth Congress?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Unfortunately, I did not vote in the Forty-eighth Congress at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I mean your party?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I was not here. My constituents had suffered a lapse. They had gone back temporarily to the beggarly elements of the world. [Laughter.] What next? And I call attention to these, because by their records you shall know them. You shall be judged of to-morrow by the works of to-day, or else all the rules of logic and experience are broken down and perverted, and there are no longer any marks along the highway of human conduct to guide us in the right way.

How was it in the Forty-sixth Congress with apportionment? You were charged with apportioning representation among the people of the States. What did you do? Because this side of the House refused to permit you to give to one man who had fought four years against his country three times the political power in controlling the legislation and administration of the country that is wielded by a man who fought as many years in the country's defense, you permitted that Congress to adjourn without making the apportionment. What did the Republicans do when they came back in the Forty-seventh Congress? At once they addressed themselves to the effort of completing a work which you had attempted but abandoned because we insisted that it should be finished with reference to justice to all sections. We simply sought to know what was right and just in that behalf. So just and so creditable was that apportionment that it commended itself even to your favor and passed without delay or serious opposition.

What else? Now you are solicitous, apparently, about the working people of this country; you are solicitous about the currency of this country, which so immediately affects their interests. The bank charters were expiring, and some legislation was indispensable to prevent financial disturbance and a panic. Did you meet the public requirements and just expectation? You did not. Why? Because you represent the topmost upper-ten and the thoroughly and absolutely lower-million, the bottom of the basin and the brim. The yeomanry of the country, the healthful stratum of active, earnest middle life, you were not actively concerned about. What did you do? Did you touch that question? Though you knew neglect would be followed by contraction and disturbing conditions that would again paralyze all our industries, you did absolutely nothing; shirked your duty, dodged the responsibility. Why? Because you were guided by a rule of action that does not seek merely to do what is right but searches for mere expedients. You were afraid to take action in regard to the bank charters.

What else? There was the Geneva award. You remember that when England, through her sympathetic action, if not by her positive efforts, assisted in the attempt to destroy the young Republic, we said to our mother country, if it ever occurs that this nation can stagger to her feet she will hold you to an account for this; and so she did, and into our Treasury England paid over $15,000,000 to repair the damage her cruisers had done our commerce. There it was in the national Treasury. You had been appealed to time and time again to proving for its distribution. Why did you not do it? Because two conflictine interests came in here; and unwilling to serve one without both you fell between the two stools and left the duty unperformed. It came over to the Forty-seventh Congress, and, asking no question except what is right and just and believing that what is right and just is always expedient, we addressed ourselves to the work of providing for the distribution of that fund. Our action was satisfactory to the country.

What else? Here was the Mormon question. The civilized world was protesting against that monstrosity, that "twin relic of barbarism." You listened to the prayers of the evangelical associations of this country, you denounced from month to month the evil; but there in your midst sat Elder Cannon, backed and supported by the influence of four healthy, vigorous wives [laughter], and his frown was sufficient to prevent any attempt by you to strike polygamy. The question came before the Forty-seventh Congress, a Republican Congress, and in less than ninety days that evil was put under the ban of the law.

Our industries! You champion them! You can not find a page upon the statute-book from 1798 to this hour where by Democratic votes our industries were even upheld, or for a moment encouraged, and yet the Democratic party poses as a defender and champion of all these. I call attention to them because the whole country is interested in them; because, in the language of my friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], they are "economic questions."

What of our finances? To-day there is too much reason to apprehend that your anxiety is to do that which will catch votes, rather than to do that which will tend in the future to build up the honor and credit of your country and secure its permanent prosperity by the adoption and maintenance of a currency which shall be a fixed and unvarying measure of values, whether of one or both the metals.

Now, only one word more, and I have done, and will yield the floor to my friends. My brother from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] suggested that we should discuss economic questions and refrain from that which savors of partisan debate. What are economic questions? What profits it to us who represent the two hundred and fifty thousand mills, shops, and factories of the country that we with our voices and with the votes of freemen uphold them if those who have no industries in common with us, and are opposed to the system by which alone ours can be protected—what good, I repeat, does it do us to stand about those industries and defend them if one vote in one section of the country cast to strike them down is worth three votes in our section to uphold them?

Is an effort here and elsewhere to correct that inequality an economic question or not? Are we to be mere lickspittles who can consent, simply consent to stay and breathe God's air without asserting our manhood? I insist, and it is all I claim, that a citizen of Ohio, or Indiana, or Illinois shall have as much right to be heard on this floor by his ballot and that his ballot shall be as potent to influence legislation as that of any other man in any other section of this country. And since this question has to do with economic effects and the rights and well-being of all our people, it is, I submit, a very economic question. And I refer to it because, and only because it comes to our very hearthstones. I shall be glad and rejoice when we shall all turn our eyes toward the morning. In speaking of this great question one of my Democratic friends said to me by way of chiding, "I turn my face toward the morning." I replied, "Yes; yesterday morning." [Laughter.]

We do indeed turn to yesterday to learn the lesson which should guide us in the labor of to-morrow. I shall be glad when the intelligence and the property which is the outgrowth of industry and care, when the thinking men of the South who want that section strong in the right and prosperous in all its border, realizing that their great interests and just ambitions go hand in hand with those of the same class of men in other sections, shall join in a united effort for the general good of all parts of our common country. I shall be glad, gentlemen, when the waters in your rivers shall not run as now unvexed to the sea, but when all those streams shall turn the wheels of a thousand busy industries, when your mines shall awaken at the touch of quickened industry and your coal fields shall be the scene of active enterprise, and you shall rejoice in a prosperity that shall find expression in lifting all men up by enlarging their opportunities and preparing them for a more intelligent discharge of private and public duties.

I agree that the Democratic party is indeed a great leveler, but unfortunately your manner of leveling is to drag men down; ours to lift men up. You, in many sections, are accustomed to make the poor wretch satisfied with his lot, not by pointing him to possibilities above, but to a more wretched condition below. That is what made Democracy strong in the North. True manhood was not exacted; intelligence was not demanded of them; it was only required that they should do the bidding of a great oligarchy and vote the Democratic ticket. You say, "Well, Democratic brethren are pretty numerous." So they are. For the reasons just mentioned it is easier to be a Democrat than it is to be a Republican. One only has to lie still in the boat and float. [Laughter.] He does not have to pull an oar in the current of thought, or lift a hand in the field of moral reform. That is the great difference between the two parties. The motto of the Republican party is, "upward and onward."

And now, in conclusion, I ask you, gentlemen on the other side, to point me to any act of yours in the whole history of the past fifty years of which you are justly proud and which was of your conception or the result of your handiwork. Why, if I did not want to be absolutely and thoroughly amiable, I might cite all the great events of the last half-century in support of my argument. I search in vain to find an industry that would be safer in your keeping. I have asked with earnestness, my fellow-citizens, in each campaign, how it could be possible that the industries of this country could be safer in the hands of people who have none of their own, and who have been laboring for a century to strike ours down. And in this same line it is pertinent to ask, is the free-school system safer in the hands of a party which has no sympathy with the system which in the South would not permit them to exist, and in the North would close the free public schools because they are "godless"—opposing them earnestly and honestly, I admit, but yet opposing them, and on that ground.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy more time, and in conclusion I have only to say that my rule of action is, and shall henceforward be, to judge of all parties as I judge of men. I shall continue to act upon the suggestion of the prophet who said, "Show me thy faith without thy works and I will show thee my faith by my works." "We can not gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles." Of the principles you have planted and the promises you have made we have gathered nothing that to-day these people prize or that their children can point to with pride in the history that records the achievements of the great Republic. I thank you, gentlemen, for your kind attention, and especially those gentlemen who have yielded me their time. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York [to Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. Before you sit down, will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly I will.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Why is it that in a Democratic city like New York, in every district in the city, it takes not less than 30,000 votes to elect a Congressman, while in Rhode Island it does not take over 5,000 or 6,000?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Because they "vote often" in New York city.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Not by a good deal.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will tell you. One reason is, as the history of New York shows, that the vote cast there for a Democratic candidate is limited not by the number of voters but by the size of the ballot-box. [Laughter.] Another reason is this: Each State may regulate, as Rhode Island does now and as Virginia used to, the qualifications of its voters; and if my friend is not afraid of his constituents, he will agree with me that the quality of voters—having reference not alone to property, but to intelligence and worth—may sometimes be a more important consideration for the country than the sheer force of numbers where the voters are mere voting machines.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I thought you had the privilege of coming from a State that has just honored JOHN SHERMAN by re-electing him to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. And in a speech delivered by Mr. SHERMAN in the Ohio Legislature a short time ago, he said that the securing of honest elections in New York was attributable to a great man by the name of Samuel J. Tilden?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. He did. It is the first time I ever knew him to pay that gentleman a compliment, and I suppose he did it because Mr. Tilden is in the decline of life. Now, I want to call my friend's attention——

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Wait a minute.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another point. You have an election law——

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Wait a minute. You listen to me.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Very well. The gentleman is aggressive, like all New Yorkers. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. You said the vote in our city was attributable to the largeness of the ballot-box. I think the election through which we have recently passed shows that it was attributable exclusively to our election laws.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Under which a Democratic President was elected.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Election laws passed by a Republican Legislature over the almost unanimous opposition of your Democratic friends.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Not at all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the record.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Not at all. We do not have contests over the elections in New York as you have in Ohio. But you have not answered my question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What question?

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Why it is that 30,000 votes are required to elect a member of Congress in any district in New York city, while 5,000 or 6,000 can elect a Congressman in Rhode Island.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have explained that. It depends upon the qualifications of the voters, which are different in different States.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. It depends upon the law.
Mr. NORWOOD obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. McCook, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a resolution (in which the concurrence of the House was requested) for the printing of additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1885.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the valuable time of this House has been wasted for four days in the consideration of a bill to which I presume not one member has any objection. But this arrest of the public business has occurred in consequence of an assault which was made without provocation on the South and on the Commissioner of Pensions by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson]. Being from that section, I desire to submit a few remarks in reply to that gentleman. His speech on that occasion, if successful in no other respect, was successful in one, so far as I am concerned, for I never before realized any truth in the cynic's witticism, "Beware of a Scotchman when he smiles." The gentleman must have been exceedingly eager to deliver himself of that piece of declamation, which is as familiar to this House and this country, where it has been delivered a thousand times, as "The boy stood on the burning deck" or "Mary had a little lamb." [Laughter.] But I do not mean to discredit the style of the gentleman's declamation, for I say here and now, as an acknowledgment in the presence of this House, that his declamation of that aged piece of classic fustian was one of the finest physical efforts I ever saw or heard. [Laughter.]

But I say the gentleman was exceedingly eager to declaim that piece of antiquity on that occasion, when we consider the circumstances and the moment of time which he seized upon to enforce our attention. The House was considering the general invalid pension bill. Democrats and Republicans, ex-Federal and ex-confederate soldiers were moving abreast in solid column, without a single straggler, to do an act of mercy and of justice to the survivors of the Union Army and to the widows and orphans, when the gentleman from Iowa, stepping forward, arrested the column, and smiling upon the confederates in that line as gently as Brutus smiled upon Cæsar in the capitol on "the ides of March" when he invited him to lie down and take a rest at the base of Pompey's statue, commenced to address those confederates in about the following delicate, persuasive strain:

"I now approach this subject with great hesitation and delicacy. The weak spot in my nature is, I have not got a hating heart. I can knock a fellow down when I am mad and the next minute pick him up and help him and be his friend. The tendency of my mind is for fraternity. Therefore I beg to say, you have no right to be here. You got here by stuffing ballot-boxes and by killing negroes with shotguns. [Laughter.] Do not misinterpret my motives or sentiments. The tendency of my mind is to fraternity. You gave an almost solid vote three weeks ago against the bill to give a pension of $12 to Union soldiers' widows. There are one hundred and five of you and sixty-five of you voted against that bill—almost a solid vote from the South. Let no gentleman who was in the confederate ranks against me (I speak not of the Union, but against me) misinterpret my feelings. I approach the subject with hesitation and with delicacy. You are a band of criminals. [Laughter.]

"There is hardly a Constitution of the United States to be found in the Southern States. Mr. Oates, I feel in the kindest and sincerest spirit imaginable, and just now I am feeling my own oats. [Laughter.] You criminals boast that you will control this Government in spite of the Constitution, and, feeling in the kindest spirit imaginable, I charge you with as great crimes under the forms of law as when Sumter was fired on. [Laughter.] You pretend that you voted against $12 a month because you thought $8 enough. I wish I could feel that to be true; but I do not, because you smoke $24 worth of cigars a month. [Laughter.] By your almost solid vote you unfurled the bloody shirt in my face, notwithstanding I fought for both sides during the war." [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman kindly allow me a word? Does he intend to have that go to his constituents as the speech made by me?

Mr. NORWOOD. I intend this, as the substance of what you said as reported in the Record, to go to my constituents.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If you intend to quote that as an original speech made by me, there is not a word of truth in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Norwood] yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. NORWOOD. I can not yield further.

"But, gentlemen, to sum up: As I am at this moment speaking with unusual delicacy for me; as I would not have you misinterpret my feelings; as the tendency of my mind is to fraternity; as I just now feel in the kindest and sincerest spirit imaginable, as you can see by my soft and persuasive language and by my smile, and as I have not got a hating heart, I declare unto you that notwithstanding you waved the bloody shirt in my face; notwithstanding you boast you will rule this Government outside of the Constitution; notwithstanding I don't believe your reason for opposing the increase of widows' pensions; notwithstanding you have no right to be here and commit great crimes to get here; notwithstanding you stuff ballot-boxes and kill negroes and don't read the Constitution, still I declare unto you confederates that I respect you, and ever shall respect you, and I would rather dance an Irish jig on burning coals in hell with you forever than to be eternally in heaven with a Northern copperhead." [Great laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is pretty stiff; but I stick to it.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the compliment paid by the gentleman from Iowa to that ballot-box-stuffing and shotgun brigade has no equal in its sentiment of devotion. In history or fiction there has never been but one instance which approached it, and that was when Dame Quickly was narrating to Pistol and Bardolph the circumstances of the death of Sir John Falstaff [laughter], when Bardolph, in the enthusiasm of his roguish soul, cried out, "Would I were with him, wheresome'er he is, whether in heaven or in hell." [Laughter.]

Speaking for myself only, while I return my profoundest acknowledgments to the gentleman from Iowa for the offer of his society if I should be so unfortunate as to take the wrong road and join him down below [laughter], and while I do not doubt that he will not be much worse than the average of the naturalized citizens of that country so populous with involuntary immigrants, yet I here and now enter my solemn and vigorous protest against accepting his delicate companionship [laughter], for I am persuaded, notwithstanding his peculiar delicacy in approaching a subject and his tendency to fraternal feeling, that no engagement, however pressing it might be upon those who would be going through the very rapid evolutions supposed to be incident to that torrid clime, could prevent the gentleman from arresting the column and mounting upon a red-hot stump and insisting that we should listen to him declaiming that stale piece of political lore. That would be a punishment greater than I could bear. [Laughter and applause.] I would be in favor of inaugurating another rebellion [renewed laughter], even with the certain foreknowledge that the gentleman in ten minutes would be found fighting first for the devil and then for me. [Laughter.]

The gentleman has caused in me the profoundest gratitude by the announcement that he fought for the South during the late unpleasantness between the United and the Confederate States. When that overwhelming outburst of plethoric philanthropy and continental patriotism spurted from his pierced and lacerated bosom, as he approached the gentleman from South Carolina the other day, as a revival preacher leaves his pulpit and approaches a hardened sinner [laughter], I confess that I took an extra grip of my lachrymal ducts, which I discovered were about to leak. [Great laughter.]

I wondered if such patriotism is hereditary, and if it were, I began to think of that gentleman's children. When Horne Tooke was on trial for treason, and the attorney-general began to expatiate about his personal virtues and about his desire to leave his good name as a rich legacy to his children, Horne Tooke was seen to be in tears, and when his counsel asked him the cause, he said he had just been thinking what a very small legacy these unfortunate children would receive. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would not change it with yours, my friend from Georgia. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.] My legacy to my children I can afford to leave side by side with yours.

Mr. NORWOOD. You will have your time to speak when I get through.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I throw that in to help along affairs.

Mr. NORWOOD. I thought also how many valuable lives could have been saved if in the beginning of the war the gentleman had approached the confederate lines with his peculiar delicacy, and decorated himself with one of his sweetest smiles; for every confederate soldier would have incontinently fled. [Laughter.] And when they might have recovered their senses, if they ever could sufficiently to consider what it was they had seen, the mystery would have remained unsolved, like another mystery recorded in an old song:

Some said it was the red moon,
And some said nay;
Some said it was the devil,
And they all ran away.

[Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I never met them but they did run away before I got through with them. [Applause on Republican side and laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. NORWOOD. My honorable friend the other day—and have I not the right to call him friend when he fought for me?—declared he had said nothing for the purpose of ruffling the feelings of anybody, and it was certain nobody could say anything that would ruffle his.

But I was speaking of the gentleman's expansive patriotism, and after its exhibition here a few days ago, and I imagined if Ben Lomond could be separated from the Grampian range and transported over the sea, as the gentleman was, and were set down somewhere in the middle of this country, we will say about the State of Iowa, how natural it would be for Ben Lomond to want to lie down and spread himself all over the United States and the Territories thereof with a sublime disregard of the extreme attenuation of his form. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, we can not receive Ben Lomond. Scotland can not bestow upon us her Bruce or her Wallace, for they made glorious history and their names are embalmed in the leaves that record the history they made. But she has bestowed upon us one of her choicest thistles; and, though its flowers have fallen, its thorns are still strong and vigorous. He with his patriotism can cover the whole of the United States and a small majority of the third Congressional district of Iowa and a very considerable part of himself. [Laughter.] His love has never been equaled since the time of Robin Roughhead, who declared if he could have his own way there would be no widows, for he would marry them all, and there would be no orphans, for he would father them all. [Great laughter and applause.]

The literature of Scotland has furnished us with an example that is a prototype, to some extent, of the gentleman from Iowa. The "Wizard of the North" exhausted his genius in producing the character of Captain Dalgetty, whose chief delight and labor were to fight first upon one side and then upon the other, with equal valor, fidelity, and enthusiasm. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, truth is stranger than fiction, and the character produced by Walter Scott is more than realized in the character of the gentleman from Iowa, because he can do what no fox-hunter has ever been able to do, that is, to ride upon both sides of a sapling at the same time, and to draw his sword in defense of both sides of his country, as he avows he did in the late war. [Renewed laughter.]

More than that, the gentleman, like a genuine "swash-buckler, 'keeps up the fight after the enemy has disappeared; and like the bully described in "Georgia Scenes," who was caught in the woods down upon his knees swearing and rearing and gouging the earth with his thumbs, the gentleman from Iowa keeps up the fight and makes his solo performance here in order to demonstrate how he "mout fit." [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it has been a rule of my life never to be outdone in courtesy or gratitude if it were possible, and as I feel under the profoundest obligation to the gentleman from Iowa for the declaration that he fought for me during the war, I shall now proceed to defend him against all comers. It has been insinuated here that the gentleman's speech the other day was made for a different purpose than for its effect upon this House; that he was speaking for the third Congressional district of Iowa. Mr. Chairmain, I repel the foul insinuation against the gentleman. It has been said even that he was speaking for the benefit of a successor who is to follow him from that district. That, too, is a mistake, for how can any man possibly know who his successor is to be? Again, it was intimated that he was speaking upon the pension bill for votes, when we all know it was a widow's pension bill, and widows do not vote. [Laughter.] These charges are all unjust; all false. The gentleman was actuated by pure patriotism, but it is of a peculiar kind, in making that attack upon the South. His successor might be his political or his personal enemy, if indeed there be a miscreant in the State of Iowa who could be the enemy of a man who is as full of universal charity as a three-year old doll is full of sawdust. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another, a better, and a sadder reason than all of these why the gentleman was not actuated by any selfish motive. I desire to state here that I have made a diagnosis of the case of the gentleman from Iowa, and the conclusion to which I have arrived is that he is afflicted with a disease very common but almost exclusively confined to public men, the name of which was never known until discovered in the State of Georgia This discovery was interesting. An old lady was sick and her husband had called several physicians to see her who treated her without success. Finally a young friend of mine who had just commenced practice was called in, and understanding the situation as soon as he examined the case, he told the husband that he understood it perfectly. He knew the character of the disease at sight, and told the husband that the vox populi had got down on her diaphragm. [Great laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa has a very marked and a very extreme attack of the "vox populi." [Renewed laughter.] But in order that we may understand the case better it should be borne in mind that man is composed of two parts, and all other elements entering into his composition may be resolved into these two. One of these is a love of himself, the other a love of his country. In order to shorten the formula we will call one selfishness and the other patriotism. As long as the two qualities are in equipoise the subject is perfectly healthy; but whenever selfishess begins to get a little uppermost it draws vitality from the other side, and the patient becomes very weak, the head becomes very much enlarged, while the thoracic region is very much emaciated. [Great laughter.]

That is the condition of the gentleman from Iowa. [Renewed laughter.] His case is one of the worst I have ever examined. [Laughter and applause.] He has what is called cerebro-elephantiasis. [Loud laughter and applause.] And this disease has increased until the patient's brain is affected. I have before me here a record that gives some of the symptoms of a patient suffering from that disease when it assumes the acute inflammatory cerebro-elephantiasis form. [Renewed laughter.] The difficulty with the patient laboring under the disease to the exient that the gentleman from Iowa has it is, that when he attempts to say one thing that he means, he says another, and here are some of the symptoms laid down in this record which show the character and extent of the disease.

For instance, if the patient is very eager to perform an act he will say, "I approach it with reluctance and hesitation." [Laughter.] If he has no delicacy whatever about expressing himself on a subject, he will approach you and say he approaches you with a great deal of delicacy. If he is ready to fight—and that gentleman is always ready to fight—he will approach you and say that the tendency of his mind is to fraternity. [Laughter.]

These symptoms, Mr. Chairman, are undoubted. That is the condition of the gentleman to-day. I am sorry for it.

And now I will say in conclusion, if the Congressman from the third Congressional district of Iowa will require DAVID B. HENDERSON to move out of his way so the Congressman can see his country the Congressman will be cured of this disease and he will no longer be troubled with the acute inflammatory vox populi. [Applause and laughter.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] yield for a moment till the gentleman from Iowa receives the sympathy of his friends? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a member of the House who had intended or who does now intend to vote against the bill under consideration, though the sum covered by its provisions is very large, and the amount that will be expended in pursuance of the laws which it is meant to carry out will be distributed almost wholly in one section of the country and although it grew out of the war between the States. The discussion that has taken place and that may hereafter be indulged in can not, therefore, have for its object the advocacy of the pending measure, nor spring out of any desire to strenghthen it in the House. The range of the discussion has been such that it seems to me not improper to put upon record the views which I entertain and which I believe to be those of the district I represent.

I shall take no part in the controversy over the action of the late Commissioner of Pensions, nor of the general conduct of the office, either under him or under the present Commissioner. I may, however, remark, in passing, that it is somewhat curious that the State of Iowa should be able to have over 60 per cent. of the applications for invalid pensions filed by her soldiers allowed, while the State of Kentucky has been enabled to have only 37 per cent. of the claims for invalid pensions filed by her soldiers allowed; that the State of Maine should be so successful as to have passed 66⅔ per cent. of the applications for invalid pensions filed by her soldiers, while the State of Missouri has had less than 39 per cent. of her applications for invalid pensions allowed. I do not mean to say that this difference was solely or at all because Maine and Iowa have been Republican and Kentucky and Missouri Democratic States; for there may be explanations of these and similar results which an examination of the figures filed with the report of the Commissioner of Pensions reveal that are entirely satisfactory.

Nor do I desire to take any part in that branch of this discussion which involves the per-onnel of the Pension Bureau and the application of the principles of the civil service to it. I do not know whether the statement made that only sixty-eight of the employés in that immense bureau are Democrats is correct, though I presume it is, and if so no one can for a moment believe that this great disparity was the result of mere accident or chance. It may also emphasize the initial and fundamental error in the practical application of the principles of the civil service to the then existent circumstances.

If it be true that service in any of the Executive Departments ought to be conditioned upon a preliminary examination, then I submit that it was absurd to have retained in office, and that it is now a dangerous error to further retain in office, many thousands of employés who had never passed any examination and who had obtained their positions mainly, if not solely, because of their party position and the possession of political influence. Into the foundation of the superstructure to be erected under this civil-service reform has been carefully inwrought all the incompetency, partisanship, and corruption which in twenty-five years of unlimited power had found their way into the Departments.

Nor will I enter into any discussion concerning Ohio political ethics; nor be tempted into any observations upon the past acts or present relation of either party concerning any other matter than that in hand; nor indulge in any comment on the relations of the members of the Democratic party to each other growing out of residence, except to say that the pretense of any subserviency on the part of any one or any section is a mere figment of the brain when it is honestly charged, and it is worse when not honestly charged. With deference to others, these seem to me to obscure the grave dangers threatening our finances and prevent a clear apprehension of the real questions at issue.

Nor do I desire in what it may seem to me proper to submit to the committee to even seem to speak for any one but myself. I represent in part a State which contributed to the Federal Army during the late war 75,760 soldiers—a State which will, therefore, receive a fair proportion of whatever money may be expended for pensions; a State in which perhaps more completely than any other State of the Union the animosities growing out of that painful war were healed; where the divisions occasioned by it were the most painful, but the most rapidly and entirely made up. I cordially share the prevailing sentiment of those people, and between the Federal soldiers of Kentucky and myself exist only kind and cordial relations.

There are many personal reasons, growing out of personal friendships and personal ties, which would induce me to vote for the most liberal pension appropriations both as to the rates and as to the objects, and if I were to consult solely my personal emotions and sympathies I would go as far as the most ardent in the support of all the contemplated measures concerning the increase of the pension rates and the pension list. In addition, I believe most cordially in the fundamental principle upon which all pension systems are founded. I believe it is wise to adopt as a settled policy of a republican government that those of her sons who risk their lives and health in her military service shall be rewarded therefor by receiving such pensions as will in some way compensate them for the disabilities which result from their service or take their place in the support of the families which have lost their natural means of support through the casualties of war.

It is right, when a man who is the hope of a family and its capital, deliberately risks that capital in the service of his country, that, so far as it is impaired in the service, it should be made up by the Government to whom the service is given. This is the sole ground, this is the logical limitation of pensions—that, if a man fall, his family shall be put as if he had not fallen; if his strength by disability be impaired, if it was necessary for their support, the impairment shall be made up by the Government.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there can be no ground for a pension that is not based on death or disability, and she who claims the pension must be one from whom that impairment has taken her support, for she who, with heroic love, gave her husband to the service stands evidently in a different relation from one who comes to claim a pension for the disability received by her husband before marriage.

Therefore, not only as a matter of sentiment or as the result of gratitude, but upon the colder and harder reasoning of mere economy, I have always defended a liberal pension system. Our country is but in its infancy; already has it had to pass through three foreign and one intestine war. The millennium is not yet upon us; we must expect other wars—wars that may come at unexpected times; and it is wise to let it be understood that those who offer their lives in defense of their country may be assured that if they fall some provision will be made for their families or if they become disabled, a suitable provision in proportion to the disability shall be made for them.

Mr. Chairman, I not only believe this as thinker, but I have a selfish interest in it as a citizen and father. As I project myself and my hopes and my love into that future in which my sons will be called upon to play their part in and for a country which is ours and will be theirs, I know that if war comes they will bear their due part therein, and for their sakes and the sake of the children of all I love, and for the country which is to be their heritage and with whose destiny their destinies are enwrapped, I do most cordially approve of all suitable legislation that makes a fair and proper pension system part of the settled policy of the Republic. But what ought to be the amount of the pension and who ought to be put upon the pension-rolls are not mere matters of sentiment or gush, but are to be determined by a wise consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the Government at any particular period when they are under discussion.

It is not every soldier who enters the army who ought to be put upon the pension-list. It must not be forgotten that for his services what was supposed to be an adequate consideration was at the time paid to him; that the contract expressed and implied by which he entered that service was that he should receive a certain stipulated sum in money and certain stipulated articles, and that only in case of disability should the payments be prolonged beyond the period of service, or that in case of death only should his widow and children become the wards of the people. It is but just that when a wife and family surrender to the country a husband and father who is their support, whose health and strength and labor are their capital from which the comforts of life must come, that if that health or constitution or life is taken some fair consideration shall be given that may take the place of this surrendered capital. But if that husband and father returns, so that his family has precisely the same means of support, the same capital from which the same comforts may be derived, what obligation is there that that family should be treated differently from the families of all other good citizens who well perform their citizenship? Upon what just and reasonable principle can she, who subsequently to the war, with a full knowledge of the condition of the man she is about to marry, marries one who has been a soldier, then make plea to the Government for a pension? She stands evidently in an entirely different relation from the wife who with tears and sorrow, but with patriotic heroism, gave her husband to his country's service.

And then, when we come to consider the question of what pensions we shall pay, it is not mere sentiment or gush that must be allowed to decide the quantum of the pension rate and the lists upon which pensioners shall be borne. There must be some wise calculation, like that of the builder in the parable who sat down and counted what the cost was to be.

We must not put a debt upon the people larger than can be borne. We can not put a burden on our children under a flaunting sentiment of the flag or memories of the past that will gall their shoulders through the years that are to come, and he who says, merely because they run up the star-spangled banner and blow the horn and play the brass band, that all who will not join in that cry are "traitors," is one who would spend other people's money with generosity instead of trying to find out how the public revenue can best be raised. In the spirit I have indicated, and in that spirit alone, I approach the votes which are to be given and which I have given on this subject. It is a matter of economic statesmanship.

The country which these soldiers served has no capital of its own. It is a trustee of its income for the benefit of all its citizens, and that income results solely from taxes, and taxes are coined sweat. Under whatever name your income may be placed, by whatever periphrasis it may be described, it is simply taxes gathered by the tax-gatherer. The Government can give no human being anything that it does not previously take from some other human being. Its generosity is with other people's money, contributed to the public Treasury by the force of the machinery of the law. This income must provide for all the other objects of governmental expense—for the Army and Navy, for the execution of the law, for the payment of the public debt—and it must be so arranged as to make the burden upon the tax-paying citizen as light and as equitable as possible.

Every dollar paid to the pensioner is a dollar added to the taxation of the people; and while it is a dollar that wisely and suitably given is cheerfully paid, it becomes a dollar wrung from labor, unjustly and oppressively exacted, whenever it passes beyond a reasonable provision.

Believing, as I do, that no government has the right to exact one single dollar under any pretense or for any purpose that is not fairly demonstrable to be necessary; utterly denying with uplifted hands and loving heart all claim that this is a paternal government; implicit in my faith that the country is better and her citizenship nobler the more unrestricted and free her people are left in the struggle for life; convinced that the great laws by which man is governed in his social relations is as divinely ordained as the laws which govern the precession of the equinoxes or the melody of the tides, I look with suspicious scrutiny upon every proposition which looks to the increase of taxation and the addition of governmental bounties or power.

The war has been over twenty years. The country needs much. A large and dependent race enfranchised in the march of events needs care and education. The coasts of the Republic are defenseless. From the high seas her flag has almost disappeared. Her water ways, which are the sole corrector of the oppressions of railroad corporations, clamor for improvement. Her monetary and financial systems demand careful and thorough revision. In one sense we have a surplus in the Treasury; in another, and the true sense, we have no surplus. Our public debt, subtracting all our apparent surplus, is still $1,500,000,000. The net debt of the several States, counties, and municipalities in 1880 was $1,036,584,146, and everywhere are the people in debt. It is, therefore, a delusion to speak in glowing terms of an overflowing Treasury and an enormous surplus.

Mr. Chairman, when the proposition came before the House to increase the rate paid to the widow and orphan 50 per cent., and a representative had to consider the elements which entered into his decision upon that proposition, the first fact which met him was that the present rate had been fixed years ago; that it had originally been agreed upon by a former generation of statesmen, that it had been accepted in the very throes of the war; that it had been unchanged when the money in which it was paid was at a large discount; that it had been received without complaint from 1862 to the present time. It was not, therefore, the question, shall the widow and orphan be pensioned? Nor was it the new question, to ascertain from careful calculation what was a fair rate; but it was to add, without any proof of necessity, without any cause given, 50 per cent. to a well-established and long-accepted rate.

The next fact was that the time at which it was offered was a time when a dollar had the largest purchasing power that it had possessed for many years. To-day, he who has a fixed salary is in a better relative condition than he has been for a quarter of a century or more. Everything in the country has almost touched bottom prices. Never, since the war, has a pension been relatively so valuable as it is to-day. Never could it purchase so much of comfort, so much of whatever adds to the pleasure of human life. Instead of there being any necessity in the general state of the country and of its markets and of its prosperity why this change should be made, there was every reason why it should be at least postponed. For while the dollar was now more valuable than ever before, it was also harder to obtain. There is more sweat in the dollar that pays for labor in these hard days of winter than ever before in this country.

Everywhere are the unemployed stalwart men, with wives and children dependent upon them, standing idle in the market place, for no man hath employed them. The unpleasant symptoms of the unsatisfactory condition of labor obtrude themselves upon us on every side. The strikes, which, alas! are the protests of heart and muscle against unjust demands and unrequited toil; the labor organizations, by means of which co-operation may produce more justice and wiser treatment; the sad wails of poverty which come from every city, bear testimony that this is not the time to increase the burden of the laborer, to take more from the earnings of the toiler. There are other widows and other orphans than the widows and orphans of the soldiers; and every dollar added to pensions is in part taken from them. No war can be carried on by the soldier alone. He who drives the plow or the plane, he who strikes the anvil or holds in its place the machinery which, with almost life-like intelligence, weaves the garments that are worn, are as truly the soldiers of the Republic as those who with serried ranks carry her banners to victory. They are the soldiers in the great battle of life, who deserve well of their country, and whose widows and orphans deserve our care and protection. In this discussion I pay a heartfelt tribute to the great army of the peaceful obscure, who in every rank and walk of life, through all their days of care and toil, perform well the part to which they are called; and I hesitate with sincere reluctance to vote any added dollar for any cause to the burdens which are already so hard to be borne.

I plead to-day the cause of the humble home, whose father, buried in an adjoining grave, did not go to the war, but with equal patriotism did his part in the great battle of life. It is not only the soldier element that we are to legislate for, but it is every element of the country in every part of the country. These are the conditions that stared in the face every man who had to pass an intelligent consideration upon this subject.

The provision made by existing laws for pension is in its aggregate startling; I will not attempt to show that it is unreasonable. But I do mean to say that before any increase of it ought to be made the necessity therefor should be demonstrated. The amount paid for pensions up to the 30th of June, 1885, is reported to be the sum of $765,092,640.18. To this must be added the sum of $60,000,000 appropriated for the current year. These aggregate $825,095,640.18. To this add the amount covered by the present bill, $75,754,200. These various sums aggregate $900,849,840.18, which is the sum that has been or will be paid under the laws as they now exist up to June 30, 1887. To this must be added that unknown sum which will have to be paid to those pensioners whose applications, yet undecided, will be allowed. How large this may be is a mere matter of speculation. Some have estimated it (as I see from the admirable and well-tempered speech of the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP) as adding enough to the present annual appropriation to require the annual expenditure of $125,000,000. Others make it much smaller, but it certainly will not be less than somewhere about $100,000,000, and that for a series of years.

Mr. Chairman, these figures do not of themselves create any very distinct conception in our minds of their magnitude. I find in Spofford's American Almanac that the assessable value of all properties in the great State of Texas is $562,103,227, and in the prosperous State of Kansas $248,845,227, which, added together, is $810,948,510, which is over $14,000,000 less than we will have paid for pensions by the 30th of June, 1886. Kentucky owns $423,775,589 and Iowa $465,747,387. These two States combined ($889,522,976) are $11,000,000 less than the amount we will have paid by the 1st of July, 1887, under existing laws, without the addition of a single pensioner to the rolls. The rich State of Illinois reports $796,341,326, which is in round numbers $29,000,000 less than the amount we will have paid to pensioners by the end of this current fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, if we could make these dull figures instinct with life, if we could transform them into smiling landscapes, fertile fields, growing cities, loving homes—if we could see them turned into the implements of industry and the herds and flocks which graze upon our fields and bring comfort and prosperity into our homes, and then realize that these lands and homes and flocks have been, so far as value is equivalent thereto, paid in installments year by year under these laws which have been passed for the benefit of but a single class of our citizens, we might form some conception of the magnitude of these sums.

Of course I do not mean to be understood as representing that all the sums mentioned have been paid to and for those who served in the late war, or that there will be a permanent annual expenditure of either $100,000,000 or $75,000,000. Part of the sum—in itself considerable, but relatively quite small—has been and will be paid on account of the war of 1812. And as the pending claims are allowed there will be an increase in the amount needed; then, the climacteric having been reached, there will be a gradual decrease. For how many years and to what extent this increase will continue no one can with any accuracy foretell. Certainly the amounts will reach up into the hundred millions. And we may obtain some conception of the time this burden will rest on industry by looking at the pension-roll of the war of 1812.

Seventy-one years ago that war ended—over two generations have passed away; and yet on June 30, 1885, there were 20,157 persons receiving pensions on account of the services rendered by themselves or their husbands therein. Compare the mighty armies of the last struggle—the multitudinous host which demonstrated to an astonished world that America was the most warlike nation that the world ever saw; with the mere handfuls of men that on our northern frontier, that at Lundy's Lane or the Thames, at the River Raisin or on the plains of Chalmette crowned the young mistress of the West with unfading glory, and we may perhaps realize how at the end of fifty more years the pension-roll, even though a list of honor, will be a burden; so that any increase of either rate or class means an increase of burden for at least fifty years.

It will also be borne in mind that the object of the pension law is not to support, but it is to assist in supporting, its beneficiaries. It is impossible so to frame such a law as to help only those who absolutely need help. Such laws must be, in their nature and in their provision, general; applicable to classes as classes, and not to each individual in the peculiar circumstances of his particular case. The country does not undertake to furnish full support for all the persons on its pension-roll, nor would it be able so to do. So the rates must be adjusted to aid in the support of those who are its objects.

Mr. Chairman, the addition to the annual expenditures by the passage of this widows' bill is estimated to be $6,106,922, which capitalized at 4 per cent. is a real addition to our public debt of $152,673,050. If our annual appropriations for pensions be no greater than the amount covered by the bill now under discussion ($75,754,200), it capitalized at 4 per cent. is an addition to our fixed indebtedness of $1,893,855,000. In view of these figures and of the present condition of the country I for one am not willing to go any further in this road, which leads, first, to repeal of the limitation on the arrears of pensions; and, second, to the grant of pensions to every one whose name was borne on the rolls of the Army during the war. No one can estimate what cost awaits us if we pursue this further.

It is the misfortune of this weak human nature of ours that the noblest emotions may cause lower and meaner motives; gratitude and justice to the soldier may give place to the attempt to gain or retain power by means of extravagant pensions. I impugn no man's motives; I criticise the vote of no Representative; but history reveals the dangers which lie in wait. The expenditure is startling and destructive of every present hope of development, retrenchment, and revision. But this is not its worst effect. It emasculates the courage of our public men; it tempts to low views concerning public moneys, and it fosters a spirit of dependence on Government bounty. It may be years before—God grant it may be never—that stalwart men will fill the air with shouts of "panem ac ludos!" "bread and games!" but this has been and may be. Let us appeal to the loftier spirit of self-dependence, the sterner love of independence.

These soldiers are our brethren—bone of our bone, blood of our blood—and want us to be frank and just. To them I confidently appeal from the clamors made ostensibly in their name. With them I am persuaded there is no desire to see heavier burdens laid on other people; they are not clamorous to live on the sweat of their neighbors and friends, of men as brave and as poor as they. I receive with some incredulity statements as to the poverty and sad necessities of any considerable number of the beneficiaries of these pensions. That some of them are in distress is undoubtedly too true. This is true of persons of every vocation in life. The fight to keep the wolf from the door, the strife to make "tongue and buckle meet," the ceaseless battle against sickness, misfortune, weakness, no doubt has gone against some of the most worthy. This is the not uncommon lot of humanity. But that any considerable number of the Federal soldiers or their families are objects of charity or the inmates of poor-houses I can not believe. It is not so in my section; I never knew a Federal soldier in a poor-house. As a rule they are well to do, fairly successful, and more than usually thrifty. The qualities which as a rule urged them to volunteer and to persevere—the energy, earnestness, courage, enterprise which made the Federal Army what it was—characterize them in peace and bring their usual reward.

Mr. Chairman, it can not be; it would be a slander on the army of conquest. I recall another disbanded army—the army of the conquered—whose soldiers have received no pensions. These had borne four years of march and battle, had stood in the opposing ranks exposed to the storm of shell and shot. They returned, not to prosperous communities rich and happy, not to homes of plenty, but to a land desolate, conquered, in ashes. Without pensions they have fought the fight of life.

Mr. Chairman, all these soldiers were of common blood; to-day they are brothers; and I will not believe, I can not believe, that those who were victorious in war have not been fairly successful in peace.

For the brave soldier I have naught but esteem. To him who from conviction offered his life on the wager of the battle I uncover my head and offer my hand. By a tie of common manhood and like service we are brothers. To-day between us there can be no other rivalry than for our country's good, for her glory. He who gave his services to his country can now do her no greater benefit than to call a halt in this wild chase for pensions. The day of reckoning must come; the day of payment will be the day of judgment.

The sober, solid, grave mass of the people I confidently believe agree with these views. For one, here I halt.

I do not mean to say, sir, that I am not willing to put individals on those rolls who for some technical or other reason can not be placed upon the pension-rolls; nor that in certain specified cases, where the disability is of an exceedingly grave and painful character, I might not be willing to increase the rates received, or in some given case, for reasons peculiar to it, that I would not gladly vote whatever might seem to be just; and I am willing, and more than willing, to give to the veterans who in the Mexican war won for us an empire so vast and so rich and opened to us the gateway to other and not yet realized benefits some testimonial not only of gratitude, but of the justice of the country whose area they so greatly increased and whose pathway to a higher destiny they so gloriously widened.

And I entreat that from this time forward you marry indissolubly in the same bill increase of pensions to the mode of raising the necessary revenue. No longer let the vast expenditures be hidden amid rhetorical generalities about our great wealth and overflowing coffers, but let us come down to the practical calculation of the wise builder in the parable, and see where and determine how the needed moneys are to be raised. If we will increase this debt to run for fifty years, let us dedicate a tax to its payment—a tax to be as sacred as the debt. Then we will deal candidly with the country, with the tax-payers, with the pensioners, and with ourselves. It is either mere hypocrisy or folly to thus increase our expenditures to make promises so solemn, and then neglect to provide specifically for their payment.

Now, when the coasts of the Republic are defenseless, when a dependent race enfranchised by the march of events needs care and education; when the fortifications have rotted on our coast and our flag has nearly disappeared from the seas; when the monetary system calls for revision and the tariff system calls for modification and reduction, I for one must halt before I go further in increasing either the lists of pensioners or the amounts that are to be paid them. When, sir, we are called upon to vote additions to these startling amounts, the additions in part to be borne by my people, I will not allow any man on this floor to challenge my vote for any past conduct of mine or anybody else.

It is no answer to my conscience or my heart when men say to me, "You must vote so and so or you will be suspected." I will vote as I believe the best interests of the people, for to-day and to-morrow and for years to come, require at my hands.

There are other things I wished to say, but I have only a few moments remaining. May I be pardoned, in conclusion, for a personal allusion. I feel I can speak with absolute frankness. I have no concealments; I have nothing to hide.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I represent in the vote that I have cast and that I may hereafter cast that noble and beloved constituency which has intrusted me with its representation. In its boundaries there are no animosities growing out of the war, nor has there been for years. May I be pardoned, merely to illustrate the condition of that district, a personal allusion? Of the two grown men who are dearest to me, one served four years in the confederate army, one four years in the Federal Army; suckled at the same breast, instructed at the same knee, in early boyhood becoming motherless, between the three there is only confidence and affection. There was a fourth, for whom the mother gave her life, and who seemed to grow up with the sunny lovingness that made that mother dear to all with whom she came in contact. In the early flush of his young manhood he laid his life, a Federal soldier, upon the altar of his duty, and he lies at the feet of a venerable man whose earnest, intense, and able devotion to the Union of the States is well known among the people from whom I came.

Standing by those graves and looking across the blue-grass sward can be seen in concentric circles the headstones of the Federal dead, and not far off on the slope of a beautiful hillside, under the shade of forest trees, stands the St. Anthony's cross, draped with the furled banner on the broken flagstaff of a dead confederacy, guarding in its white purity the graves of those who gave their lives for that flag. Scattered all over that beautiful cemetery are fathers and sons and brothers who served in opposing armies; and in the adjoining city, and through all the adjacent country, are those who loved those dead heroes, and live now in sweet accord, forgetful of all that was harsh and bitter, remembering with grateful piety only that which was brave and kindly and heroic. Among those people it has been my happiness to dwell, my hope to die, and there to lie until the resurrection morn, so that, when the sun of righteousness comes in the east, and I rise to meet its beams, the first sight upon which my risen eyes may fall shall be the faces of those who, however divided we may have been in our views of duty, were never divided in our love. [Great applause.]

Mr. Chairman, with memories like these, with ties like these, conscious of the rectitude of the motives which control the vote that I give, I shall meet with contempt all effort to intimidate, all purpose to misconstrue, speaking, acting, voting, as an American Representative on the floor of the American Congress, officially the full peer of any other Representative, come from where he may, whatever he may have been. It is our country, and I shall keep in view with ceaseless care her honor, her prosperity, and her glory, awaiting with calm confidence the decision of the tribunals to which I am responsible, my own conscience and the generous people whose commission I bear. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LONG. I will yield forty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will be pardoned if I do not follow in the line of discussion which seems to have been taken during the last hour or two. On the other day, when the question of arrearage of pensions was under consideration, it was charged by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], by indirection, that I had permitted the two whole years when I had the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to pass without bringing into this body a bill to repeal that iniquitous discrimination. I did not answer the charge then, fearing on the impulse of the moment I might be incorrect in my recollection. Since that time I have examined the record, and I find no measure of that character went to the Committee on Invalid Pensions at any time during that Congress. Gentlemen of the House will remember that the arrearage limitation became a bar on the 1st day of July, 1880.

The next Congress began on the first Monday of December, 1880, but a few months after the limitation had taken effect, and in the mean time there had been but little public discussion in this connection; and, if I remember correctly, no bill was even introduced looking to this repeal at any time within that Republican Congress.

I may say further, if necessary to do so in vindication of the committee over which I had the honor to preside, that by the ruling of the Speaker it was not given jurisdiction of any general pension legislation whatever, all bills having reference to pension legislation of a general character being sent by the Speaker to the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Mr. MATSON. Will my colleague from Indiana allow me to interrupt him a moment? I know he desires to be correct.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. I think his statement is substantially correct except as to the time when the first session began. It was December, 1881.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. At any rate I am correct in the substantial fact that no bills of that character were introduced and certainly, whether or not, they were not brought to the attention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions which had no jurisdiction of general legislation with reference to pensions. But I do not care to answer further in this connection.

The next matter to which I wish to call the attention of the committee is the charge so freely made that but for the action of the majority—the Democratic majority—the pensions of the widows of our dead soldiery would not have been increased from the pitiful sum of $8 to $12 a month. Now, sir, it is a matter of public history, and part of the records of Congress, that the proposition to increase the pensions of widows from $8 to $12 a month is of Republican paternity. The very first time it appears to have been offered was in the other branch of Congress—in a Republican Senate. It was not only attached to a private pension bill, and in that shape passing that body, but in the last Congress it was appended as an amendment to what was known as the Mexican pension bill and had the approval of a Republican Senate, in which shape it came from that body into this to sleep the sleep that knew no waking. How about that? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] says it was appended to that bill for the purpose of killing it, not in good faith, not for the purpose of securing that small measure of justice to the widows of our dead. What is the truth?

The Mexican pension bill was introduced by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and passed under a suspension of the rules, no opportunity given the House to amend it, and only the meager opportunity of discussing it for thirty minutes, fifteen on each side; and when it went to a Republican Senate what was done? They appended to it by way of amendment, first, the proposition to increase the widows' pensions from $8 to $12 a month; secondly, a proposition against which no man, in my opinion, dare vote who represents a Northern constituency, and that was that when a pensioned husband and father died the pension should inure to the widowed wife and orphaned children in their own right without exacting proof that the husband and father died in consequence of the wound or disability for which he was pensioned. Another proposition was embodied in it to abrogate that iniquitous requirement of pension practice, and perhaps of pension law, that compelled the pension claimant to prove affirmatively that he was a sound man at the time the Government mustered him into its service. What more? It proposed to make sufficient proof of dependence on the part of the mother or the father, dependence on the part of the parents, that such parent was compelled to earn his or her subsistence by daily labor. It also proposed to give a pension to the worthy Union soldier who was disabled or indigent.

These were the important provisions added to it by a Republican Senate, and when that bill came back here it came not loaded with these amendments for the purpose of killing the measure, but that while we were doing justice to the soldiery of the Mexican war we would do something in that way for the Union soldiery of this country. And I now say to gentlemen, if we are to give a service pension to men who were in the Mexican war for fourteen, thirty, or sixty days' service in it, it looks to me as if it were a travesty upon justice and upon the whole pension system if we are at the same time to deny a service pension to those men who marched through two, three, or four weary years in the dangerous and desolating war of the rebellion.

But speaking of this Mexican pension bill. It came back into this House in ample time to pass. The amendments were accepted by the gentleman from Illinois who introduced the original bill, and he labored with me to get—what? To get a Democratic majority to consent to take up and consider that measure. That majority could have insured its passage, but it persistently refused to do so. It obstructed its consideration in every conceivable way.

Vote after vote was taken upon the preliminary questions in this connection in this House looking toward the consideration of this bill with these amendments. In every instance—and I appeal to the record for the correctness of my statement, in every instance the Republican side of the House voted solidly for its consideration, and in every instance there was a sufficient number of filibusters on the other side to defeat it. That is history—indisputable history.

The reason that this pension bill giving to the widows $12 pension at the suggestion of a Republican Senate was not passed before is that it was defeated by parliamentary strategy on the part of the gentlemen on the other side. They refused to pass it when they had the opportunity. It is asked why the Republicans did not introduce this measure before. I answer that when the necessity for the measure became apparent, when it was seen that old age was fast coming upon these wards of the nation, that their steps were becoming weary and their limbs feeble, that they were tottering heavy with age to the grave, that their wants were correspondingly increasing, then, if it had not occured before, it was believed but a measure of justice that this increase should be made, and the Republican Representatives gave it.

But I come now to the consideration of a matter which more particularly concerns me in this discussion. I need not say which side is responsible for having introduced a partisan question into this discussion. It is here. It is immaterial to me from whence it came. It is, however, within the knowledge of every gentleman who heard the Representative from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who began the discussion that he was not content simply to defend the proposed appropriation of $75,000,000 but sought to arraign the party to which I belong for having committed outrages upon the soldiery and upon the people by the adoption of a particular line of financial policy. Further than that by intimation he arraigned the late Commissioner of Pensions for the manner in which he conducted the business of his office, and paid a glowing compliment to that gentleman's successor. My attention is called in support of that arraignment to a brief statement in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions to be found at the fourteenth page, in which he says:

> It is now an offense, prohibited by orders, as well as repugnant to all fairness, for any employé to act as the agent or attorney of any outside party. Yet, within a recent period, one clerk has confessed to the Commissioner that he acted as agent for one man in aiding to prepare from three hundred to four hundred cases. This instance is only solitary in its extent, not its character.

It would have been gratifying to the country, inasmuch as there was but one who engaged so extensively in the violation of rule and law that his name should be given. I would be glad to know what became of the fellow. Is he still in the Pension Bureau or has he been discharged? If so, when? Who was he? I should be glad and I think the gentlemen of the committee would be glad to know who the person is to whom reference is made. Let the country know who the rascal is.

I concede that it is within the possibilities that among 2,500 employés of the Pension Bureau there may have been one who so far forgot his duty as to have engaged in the business that has been attributed to this man. It is not at all remarkable that such should be the case. In selecting public agents it is not always possible to get pure men, even when you have exercised the best possible judgment and have availed yourself of the best opportunities for information. In selecting a large number of agents you will occasionally catch a scoundrel. It will always be so.

Why, sir, this administration coming into power with the blare of trumpets, this administration that had proclaimed its purpose to purify the public service, this administration which if it has any character at all has made it, as claimed by its friends in the parlance of the day, in turning the "rascals" out and putting honest men in—yet this administration has not been altogether successful in this regard. For this morning in a newspaper I found a scrap of current history. It is stated that in looking about for appointees one of the first discoveries of the present administration was one Dr. Meiere, who was generally drunk, and occasionally indulged in the pleasing pastime of drubbing his wife. After a while it found a fellow up in Colorado by the name of Judd, whose principal recommendation for office was that he was a convicted horse-thief. After a time Dunton got to be postmaster, after the courts had certified to his high moral character by a conviction for burglary. After a while Tyrer—I want you to remember his name—after serving two terms, nine years, in the penitentiary was with this record behind him received with rapture into the official embraces of this reform administration. [Laughter.]

And I do not stop here. There was Richard Board, who got into the mail service, and in thirty days he got out again, after having robbed the United States mail. And then coming down a little further to my own State we find Dowling designated for the important position of mail agent, who was either upon his own confession a giver of bribes to corrupt public officials or an abominable liar. The probabilities are that he was both. And lastly, for I do not care to follow this long list to the end, lastly Conroy—my colleagues, some of them, will remember the name; it is a familiar name in the police circles of Indianapolis; it is somewhat familiar among the penitentiary convicts in Michigan City—this Conroy, adorned by the striped apparel of the State-prison convict, was afterward appointed to an important office to illustrate the beauties of civil-service reform. Great is democracy!

I speak of these things simply to show that an administration confessedly pure, that is doing its very best to purify the public service, may sometimes make mistakes and appoint men to office who are unfit for the high trust committed to them.

If this administration, with all its pretensions to reform and purification of the civil service, and with the assistance of Eugene Higgins, can not secure appointees who are respectable and honest, how in the name of God do you expect such a thing at the hands of the Republican party, to whom you have never given credit for any effort at purification?

I come now to another branch of this question, which had very little to do with it when we commenced the discussion, but which seems now to play a very important part. I refer to that "political machine," known as the Pension Bureau, under the administration of Colonel Dudley. In the last Congress the same charges we have heard here were freely made. A committee of the House was appointed to make an investigation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] was its chairman. That investigation was thorough. I hold in my hand the record of it, containing two hundred and seventy-five pages of closely printed matter. It is almost all devoted to Colonel Dudley, the then Commissioner of Pensions. The committee was raised to, in some manner or other, vindicate its chairman. He had, or thought he had, a grievance. After he had gone through with the investigation for six weeks, and examined witness after witness, he was content to send out his report to the country with barely four lines of reference to Colonel Dudley and his execution of the duties of his office; and in those four lines he makes no charge. I read them:

> The committee can do no more at this late period of the session than to submit, without comment, the testimony upon the relation of the late Commissioner of Pensions, Colonel Dudley, and other officials of the Pension Office, to political work during the late election.

That is the whole of it. The committee was content that the charges so freely made and so widely circulated should go to the country without any comment or expression of opinion whatever as to what it proved or tended to prove. Now, what are the charges? The first charge is that Colonel Dudley prompted or directed in some way or other the special examiners of the Pension Bureau to interfere in the political campaign in the district of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and in other districts in other States. I shall refer now to an important fact which I think the gentlemen on the other side omitted to introduce. It was developed by this investigation, and is here in the archives of this committee. It is an order issued by Colonel Dudley, issued in good faith and published before that campaign began, and I now send it to the desk that it may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, March 6, 1884.

To Special Examiners:

As the time approaches when politics become the universal and often sole topic of conversation, special examiners will find it more difficult than ever to obey the injunctions laid upon them when going out, that they should in no way participate while on duty (and, except when upon leave of absence, they are always on duty) in political discussions or work by word or act.

The functions of special examiners are those of judicial officers seeking for the true facts in cases intrusted to them, and they will not only commend themselves to the communities in which they respectively work but insure the best results to their work and themselves by perfect reticence upon all topics of a political character; and it is hoped that each examiner will heed this timely warning, and to such effect that no just criticism can be made against them on this ground.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM W. DUDLEY,
Commissioner.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I assert that order was never violated with the knowledge or consent of Commissioner Dudley.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to print in this connection, without reading it, the testimony of Colonel Dudley taken before this committee, which will be found at page 261 of the committee's report. I put this testimony of an upright and truthful man before the country that it may judge between him and his accusers.

I insert it here. Colonel Dudley, being interrogated by the chairman, said:

> The CHAIRMAN. Did you not know that these men throughout the State, especially in close districts, were representing themselves as being in your employment; that you were the Commissioner of Pensions, and that they were in your employment, and do you not know that everywhere, in all parts of the State, they were telling pension claimants that, if they wanted their pensions, they had better vote the Republican ticket?
> The WITNESS. No; I do not know it, and if I had known it I would have denounced any man who did it.

The CHAIRMAN. Were not lists of claimants for pensions in the Pension Office furnished to such agents and to others in order that they might carry on political work in that way?

The WITNESS. If there were it was done by yourself and others who were engaged in politics and not by me.

The CHAIRMAN. Myself and others who were engaged in politics in that State did not have anything of the kind. Do you say you did not know that that was going on?

The WITNESS. No, sir; I did not. Nobody has been furnished with such a list out of the Pension Office, with my knowledge or consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not know that these political agents in the State of Ohio had those lists?

The WITNESS. I indignantly deny it.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you did not know that?

The WITNESS. Yes; I say it with all the emphasis that I can give to my denial; and I very much regret that you should ask me such a question, for you know me well enough to know better than to ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. I do know that that was the case in the State of Ohio.

The WITNESS. It was not the case with my knowledge, and you know that it was not the case with my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. I know that men were representing themselves all over the State as acting in that capacity.

The WITNESS. You wrote me a letter to that effect, and I answered it and told you that it was not so. You wrote me a letter that the Pension Office was being used to your detriment.

The CHAIRMAN. I ask that the letter be produced. I wrote protesting against admitting $25 contracts of claim agents.

The WITNESS. And I answered you immediately and told you that that was not the case.

The CHAIRMAN. I wrote to you protesting against these contracts.

The WITNESS. No, sir; you wrote with reference to your own election matter. You said that this thing was being used to your detriment, and I answered that that was not true with my knowledge and consent.

The CHAIRMAN. I did write a letter to you on a particular case, but not on the matter about which I have been examining you.

The WITNESS. You wrote me a letter stating that the business of the Pension Office was being used to your detriment, did you not?

The CHAIRMAN. I wrote to you respecting a special pension case.

The WITNESS. You wrote to me that the pension business was being used to your detriment, did you not?

The CHAIRMAN. Produce the letter. I wrote no letter relating to this matter. I am not a witness on the stand.

The WITNESS. But I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you deny that you knew that persons employed by the Republican committee and by yourself were making such representations throughout the State of Ohio?

The WITNESS. I do.

Q. But you yourself were engaged while Commissioner of Pensions in conducting or helping to conduct the political campaign in Ohio, were you not?

A. Yes; but I had disengaged myself from the office. I had gone away from the office and was not seeking to control the office in any shape or form.

Q. Did you sign any communications as Commissioner while you were there

A. Only the one I have spoken of.

Q. How did you sign the letter which you addressed to me?

A. I signed it personally.

Q. Are you sure of that?

A. I am very sure of it. You probably have the letter and you can produce it. I do not think you will say that I signed it as Commissioner.

Q. You were drawing pay all this time from the Government?

A. I drew my pay up to the 10th of November, as other officers of the Government did.

Q. You were absent more than thirty days in that year, were you not?

A. I was not the only officer of the Government who was absent for more than thirty days. If anybody was entitled to more than thirty days' leave of absence I was entitled to it, for in every year that I was there in the office I worked—in days' work—a year and a half.

This evidence covers this whole charge and refutes it. I pass it without comment. I defy gentlemen who have taken part in this persecution of Colonel Dudley to produce any witness, special examiner, or pension claimant who is willing to say under oath that any of these officials, at any time or in any way, used or attempted to use, his official position for the purpose of influencing the vote of any man one way or the other.

Next, it is charged that, for political purposes, the employés of the Pension Bureau were directed during a certain period to make no rejections of claims, and that this was particularly the case during the months of September, October, and November, pending the elections of 1884. To prove this the names of six witnesses are given, Smith, Fardon, Fisher, Chapman, and Sundell. I desire to print also, in connection with my remarks, the testimony of each of these six witnesses on that subject. I wish I had time to have every word of it read in the presence of this House. I say here and now, as to the testimony of these witnesses, that it does not in any manner charge or pretend to implicate Colonel Dudley in making any such order.

I assert that no one of them pretends that such instructions came from Colonel Dudley or by his authority. I say further, that every one of these witnesses denies with emphasis that it was told them by any officer or clerk of the Pension Office that this was intended for political purposes. I assert that. Further, in this connection, I desire to put in the testimony of Mr. Comstock and of the then Commissioner of Pensions to show that the explanation of this whole matter was furnished to the committee. They had it in full, and it was unanswerable. Truth always vindicates itself. Further, the record shows that there was a time when the board of review became so crowded with business that it was thought best to suspend for awhile the further consideration of rejected cases in order that the board might have an opportunity to pass upon pension claims that had been already allowed. It was done that the soldiery of the country, whose claims had been passed on favorably, might have the benefit of their pensions. That explanation this committee had, and it is contradicted by no evidence. I have looked through that volume of testimony, and I assert here it is not controverted. Colonel Dudley gives his explanation, and so does Mr. Comstock, who was in charge of the division where it was asserted this order had been given. These explanations will be put of record.

Mr. MATSON. My colleague will allow me to ask whether he intends to have the testimony of those witnesses printed with his speech?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Every word of it that is at all material. I will insert the evidence of the six witnesses named by my colleague [Mr. MATSON] here.

The first of these is Charles S. Sundell. He said:

Q. What division are you in?

A. The Western division.

Q. The division of which Mr. Comstock is the chief?

A. Yes.

Q. State whether or not, at any time after your return and prior to the November election, you received any instructions from either of your chiefs, or any suggestion from either of your chiefs, or any order from either of your chiefs, touching the preparation of letters notifying claimants of rejected claims, and if so, what.

A. I did not.

Q. Or anything else in reference to rejected claims?

A. No, sir.

Q. You never received any such order?

A. No, sir; not from one of my chiefs.

Q. Did you receive it from any one?

A. No, sir; I was lead to believe, and I understood when I returned, that cases should not be rejected.

Q. How did you get that information?

A. From my colleagues round about me, as I had been away in September.

Q. So that when you got back at the end of September you found that that was the practice in the office?

A. Yes. My colleagues did so, and I followed their example.

* * * * * * *

Q. Was there delay in any work on account of political reasons?

A. No, sir; not on my part.

Q. Was there any instruction or understanding from your superior that any distinction was to be made between Democrats and Republicans in the work that was to be done, or in the allowance or rejection of claims?

A. No, sir.

Q. No distinction was to be made as to the influence and rights of any member of Congress on account of his politics?

A. No, sir.

Q. Every claim was to be considered on its own merits?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you understand, at or about that time, that the Secretary of the Interior was of opinion that claims should be rejected by the board of review and not by an examiner or a chief of division?

A. Yes; I was told so.

Q. And the work of the board of review was very crowded, was it not?

A. I understood so.

Q. So that, in October, on your examination of a claim, if you found that, in your judgment, it should be rejected, that claim, under the view of the Secretary of the Interior, should be sent to the board of review to be passed upon?

A. Yes.

Q. And that became the absolute law of the office, did it not, after Mr. Clarke was appointed Commissioner of Pensions?

A. Yes.

Q. He was acting Commissioner in September, was he not?

A. I understood so.

Q. Was there anything done or ordered to be done, so far as you know, for the purpose of affecting one political party or another in the discharge of the duties of the Pension Office?

A. No, sir.

The witness implicates no one. No one will contend that it casts even a shadow on the official conduct of Colonel Dudley.

The next witness is William Smith. He said:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age, residence, and business.

A. I am fifty-two years of age; I reside at 2339 E street, southeast; I am a clerk in the Pension Office.

Q. In what division?

A. In the Western division.

Q. What are your duties there?

A. I am examiner in "dependent" cases.

Q. State what you know as to the practice of the Pension Office in rejecting cases during the late political campaign?

A. What I know in relation to the practice of the Pension Office towards rejected cases in the late campaign has been to hold them up, by instructions from our superiors. That was the general understanding.

Q. During what months was that the practice?

A. I think in the latter part of September and October.

Q. And were cases held up in the office in that way to your knowledge?

A. They were.

Q. You state that they were held up under instructions from your superiors. State who your superiors were.

A. My assistant chief of division, George N. Smith. I do not know of any other superior who gave those orders except he. He was the one who was acting on the work of our section as reviewer. He reviewed our work on rejected cases.

Q. And it was from him that these instructions came?

A. It was from him that these instructions came.

Q. You did not inquire, I suppose, whether he got such instructions from his superiors or not?

A. No, sir; I made no inquiry whatever. I simply obeyed orders and kept the claims on my desk.

Q. In such cases do you receive orders from your immediate superior?

A. Yes; that is the custom of the office.

Now comes T. F. Kinney, who testifies on this point as follows:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age, residence, and position.

A. I am forty years of age; I reside in Washington, D. C.; I am an examiner in the Pension Office.

Q. State what division of the Pension Office you are in.

A. The western division.

Q. Give the name of the chief of your division.

A. Mr. Comstock.

Q. Give the names of the assistant chiefs under him.

A. Mr. Green and Mr. George N. Smith.

Q. State what you know about an order or direction from any superior to hold up rejected cases and not report them.

A. Mr. Smith came on the floor one day and was conversing with some other examiners there. In his conversation with them I understood him to say that we were not to write letters of rejection, but to lay the rejected claims aside for the present.

* * * * * * * *

Q. State, if you can, the exact language of Mr. Smith about holding up cases.

A. I can not state his exact language.

Q. State the substance of it.

A. The sum and substance of it was, when cases came back from the board of review requiring letters of rejection to lay them aside.

Q. And not to write the letters?

A. To let the other work go on and attend to everything else in preference to them.

Here is the witness upon whose evidence the gentlemen draw for their whole case.

Edwin L. Chapman said:

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you recollect anything in regard to rejected cases?

A. Yes.

Q. State what it was.

A. I remember that Mr. Smith, the second assistant chief of the division, came to my desk, stood near me and said, "If you have any claims for rejection do not reject them at present, but hold them up."

Q. Did he state how long you were to hold them up?

A. No, sir.

Q. What time was that?

A. I think it was about the first or second week in October, I do not recollect the time exactly.

Q. That order you understood to be general throughout the division?

A. Yes.

Q. Was anything said about the reason for that order?

A. No, sir; not by him.

Q. What was the understanding among the clerks?

A. I understood it was for political purposes.

Q. Was that the understanding among the clerks?

A. I do not know about the examiners generally. I understood it so myself.

Q. Was it talked of among the examiners?

A. It was talked of some, but it has been talked of more since the election.

Q. And it was talked of at that time?

A. Some.

Q. And so far as the talk went, it was the understanding that the order was for political effect?

A. I can not recollect what was said about it.

Q. That was your understanding?

A. That was my personal understanding.

Q. Did you make known that understanding or did you say anything to indicate to Mr. Smith or any one else that that was your understanding?

A. I do not recollect whether I did or not. My recollection about it is quite indistinct.

Q. What did you do with the cases for rejection after receiving that order?

A. When I had a case for rejection, if the rejection was on medical grounds, I referred the question to the medical board and let the board take the responsibility of rejection, and if it was on legal grounds, I let my superior officer take the responsibility.

Q. During this time no letter of rejection was written to claimants?

A. I did not reject any.

Q. Did you reject any claims and notify the claimants?

A. In October I rejected two cases. In the first case I notified the claimant. In the second case the rejection came to my desk on the morning of the day that I left for my home (the 31st of October). That was a Kansas claim. After I returned back I notified the claimant of the rejection.

Q. Then you did reject two cases?

A. Yes. That is, the medical board rejected one of them.

Q. You did not refer any to the board after you got that order?

A. I did not have any to refer.

Q. When did you resume the examination of these cases and report any for rejection?

A. I resumed their examination the first Monday after the November election, when I returned to the office.

Q. Do you recollect how many cases you rejected in September altogether?

A. One or two.

Q. And how many in November?

A. Not any.

Q. How many in December?

A. The medical board rejected two of my cases and the legal board rejected one, which I had submitted for admission.

* * * * * * * *

Q. If I understood you rightly the remark that was made to you by Mr. Smith was, "If you have any claims for rejection hold them up?"

A. That was it.

Q. And that is all he said on the subject?

A. That is all that I remember he said.

Q. I understood further from your testimony that you continued right on, following the course which you had already pursued in regard to the rejection or allowance of claims?

A. Certainly.

Q. If you had a claim which you thought it your duty to reject, you said so?

A. Yes.

Q. You had during the month of October two rejected cases?

A. Yes.

Q. One of those was rejected by the board of review and you wrote the letter of rejection?

A. Yes.

Q. The other was rejected, but coming on your desk the morning of the day that you left on leave of absence you did not have time to notify the party?

A. That was it.

Q. So that your course was not changed in the slightest degree by the remark made by Mr. Smith?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any distinction being made between Democratic and Republican members of Congress in the matter of giving preference to claims?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of anything being done or any instructions or orders being given by your superiors to do anything for the purpose of its having any political effect?

A. No, sir.

The evidence of the six named witnesses closes with the statements of Fisher and Farden, which I now insert.

William T. Fisher sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age, residence, and position.

A. I am twenty-eight years of age; my residence is Washington, D. C.; I am an examiner in the Pension Office.

Q. In what division?

A. In the western division.

Q. What class of cases have you charge of?

A. Invalid and increase and new disability cases.

Q. State what you know about orders not to give out notices of rejection during the months of September, October, and November.

A. I received a verbal order from George N. Smith, second assistant chief of division, that if I had any claims to reject I should lay them on one side.

Q. Was there any reason given why you should lay them on one side?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was there nothing said about it?

A. Not at that time.

Q. How long has Mr. George N. Smith held the position of assistant chief of the western division?

A. I think he was made second assistant chief in May or June, 1884.

Q. How long did he continue in that position?

A. He is in that position now.

Q. Do rejected cases go through him now as they did before?

A. He has charge of the widows' claims.

Q. What time did he give this verbal order that notices of rejected cases were to be withheld?

A. I can not give the exact day, but I think it was in September.

Q. Did he say how long that thing was to last?

A. He did not.

Q. Did he say anything about its continuance until after the election?

A. No, sir.

Q. When did he give you notice that you were to take up these cases again?

A. He did not give me any such notice at all.

Q. Have you ever taken any rejected cases up since?

A. I never had any case to reject.

Q. The work there in the office is done with special reference to the proper advancement of the business of the office?

A. Yes.

Q. And with a view to doing justice to claimants?

A. Yes.

Q. Without distinction as to the men who present the claims, but with each case standing on its own merits?

A. Yes.

J. D. Farden sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age, residence, and position.

A. I am twenty-three years of age; I reside at 216 D street northwest; I am a clerk in the Pension Office.

Q. What are your duties?

A. Examining invalid, original, and increase claims.

Q. State whether you received any instructions respecting claims for rejection during the month of September or October last; and, if so, what they were.

A. I do not recollect the exact time, but Mr. Smith, the assistant chief, told me (about the 1st of October, I think) that no more cases were to be rejected there. There was no reason given for it, and I rejected no more claims after that time, I think.

Q. Until what time? When did you begin again to report cases for rejection?

A. I do not think I have rejected a case since then, but my record will show.

Q. During that time what did you do with cases for rejection?

A. I rejected no claims after that order.

Q. While that order was pending, what did you do with cases of that kind?

A. I was on my leave from September 10 until September 29, I think, and when I got back I had between five hundred and six hundred claims on my desk. I did not take up any cases for rejection. The general practice is to take up meritorious cases and put them through.

Q. State whether or not it was a general understanding among examiners in your division that no rejections were to be made at that time.

A. That appeared to be the general understanding.

This evidence nowhere and in no way connects Colonel Dudley with these vague orders and directions about the suspended cases. Indeed it is shown that whatever directions were given in this connection were given by George N. Smith in October or November, and after Colonel Dudley had resigned and gone to Ohio. It is passing strange that George N. Smith was not called by this truth-seeking committee to make a statement of the facts. Again it will be observed that all that was said about this having any political significance was gathered from idle and irresponsible rumor. But on this point Colonel Dudley testifies as follows:

I see from the course of questions asked and from some of the testimony given, that there is a very evident misapprehension about the matter of rejected claims; and it will give me great pleasure, if the committee will allow me, to state what my order was on that subject. Up to about 10th of February, 1883, the practice in the office was (that is, after the constitution of the review board) that, when an examiner had reached the point in a case where in his judgment the evidence warranted the admission or rejection of a case, he briefed the case, stating very succinctly all the testimony on which he relied to form a judgment; and he forwarded that through his proper superior to the board of review, where the case was reviewed and final action taken. The work was accumulating so rapidly and the board of review was so much inclined to get behind with it, that I went to the board of review frequently (perhaps during the three weeks previous to the issuing of this order of 10th of February, 1883), and asked the individual reviewers to give me, as near as they could, the percentage of cases submitted to them for rejection which in their judgment should not be admitted or continued for further testimony and sent back to the division for that purpose. I do not now remember the result of my inquiry, but the percentage of such cases was so insignificant that it convinced me that much of the time of the high-priced labor and valuable service was being spent on dead matter. That is to say that the board of review was spending time in reviewing evidence in rejected cases and finally approving the action of the examiner to an extent that did not justify the sending to them of that class of cases. On that I issued this order of February 10, 1883, after a pretty full consultation with my deputy commissioners. I will read it:

"CIRCULAR.

"1. Hereafter all cases submitted to the review board shall be upon an opinion for admission, with the exception named in last paragraph"—

That is, the last paragraph in this circular.

"2. Attention is invited to the first paragraph of order No. 65, concerning rejected cases"—

Which reads:

"That no cases shall be rejected until every available source of information is exhausted, unless the rejection be clearly on legal points.

"3. Where an examiner is in doubt as to the proper action, no case should be rejected by him except upon consultation with the chief of his division.

"4. Where cases are rejected by an examiner the chief of division should allow the proper credits on his records therefor"—

Without such a regulation as that, it will be readily seen that examiners would be pushing for admitted cases, so as to keep up their records, at the expense of cases which should be rejected. This was so that there should be no unfair advantage taken of it.

"But if afterwards called up and admitted by a reviewer on the same evidence, a double charge for errors in each case so reversed shall be made against such examiner."

The object of that paragraph was to secure deliberation and carefulness on the part of the examiner.

"5. Chiefs of divisions will not permit the consideration of new evidence in rejected cases or re-examination of rejected cases reopened therefor, to the hindrance or delay of cases that may be submitted for admission; and in answer to communications calling up rejected cases, will close the correspondence, if possible, by using the proper circular in response.

"6. This circular-order does not apply to cases submitted from the S. E. D., nor to claims filed since July 1, 1880, that are rejected on the ground of no disability."

In that connection I would like to read a previous order No. 80. It is as follows:

"PENSION OFFICE, April 26, 1882.

"Ordered, In all cases where report of a medical examination shows no disability, and other evidence tends to show that the disability actually exists, the claimant shall receive another examination by a board of surgeons if practicable, or another surgeon, with specific instructions setting forth the facts in the case; and where this examination shows no disability, no rating of pensions shall be allowed to continue after the date of such a report unless so ordered in writing by the Commissioner or one of the deputy commissioners."

That, so long as I remained Commissioner, was the practice of the office as settled by these orders; and the result was, I thought, beneficial to the service. It insured a review of rejected cases by a competent officer of the division, and did not encumber the board of review with cases which were submitted for rejection. I know nothing of my own personal knowledge as to any change of the order, but judging from the testimony given here, I can see that the impression prevailed that that order was to be rescinded, and that cases were to be sent to the review board hereafter instead of being rejected in the division as that order provided. It is apparent to me, from the testimony I have seen, that the impression prevailed that it was not beneficial for the examiner to spend his time in rejecting cases. That is all, I think, that is in it, and I think that that explains the mater.

Q. Did the action in that regard have any political significance, one way or the other?

A. None under Heaven. It had nothing whatever to do with politics in any shape or form. I notice that my successor was not of the same mind as myself in reference to the wisdom of such a policy as that; and, of course, it was entirely competent for him to change that practice, and I should imagine that the effect would be about such as has been testified to.

This ought to be satisfactory to every fair and candid man whatever his politics.

Now, John M. Comstock was chief of the division to which George N. Smith and the six witnesses whose evidence was taken belonged. Whatever was done in regard to rejected cases he knew. What he says is as follows:

Q. Some testimony has been given as to an order issued, or to an understanding had in your division, that pension cases were not to be rejected during the political campaign. State first if you, as the chief of that division, either officially or unofficially, ever made any such order or suggestion to anybody.

A. Never, to anybody.

Q. State whether any action of that sort (I mean holding up claims and not rejecting them) was taken by yourself, or by any one else with your knowledge, during the fall of 1884.

A. No, sir.

Q. At that time, or prior to it, had not adjudicating examiners been in the habit of rejecting claims?

A. They had been in the habit of submitting them for rejection to the chief of the division or to the assistant chief. Examiners did not reject claims themselves.

Q. But if they concluded that a claim should be rejected, they submitted it either to the chief of the division or to the assistant chief?

A. Yes, recommending such a thing.

Q. Do you know, of your own knowledge, of Mr. Green or Mr. Smith ever issuing any order as to the rejection or non-rejection of claims during the fall of 1884?

A. I have no knowledge of any such order, and never supposed there was anything of the kind until the recent occurrence.

Q. You have heard or read some of the testimony given on that subject before this committee?

A. Yes; I read some of it and I heard some of it.

Q. If any case was held back by any adjudicating examiner during the fall of 1884 and prior to the election, for political and partisan purposes that you know of, I wish you would state it.

A. I have no knowledge of any such case being held back in fact, either in my division or any other division. I never knew of cases being held back for partisan purpose—I mean during Mr. Dudley's administration.

Q. I mean at any time in the fall of 1884. I refer to what would be ordinarily included in the campaign of 1884.

A. Never.

Q. State to the committee whether the Secretary of the Interior at any time intimated to you or to the Pension Office that he thought the rules should be changed in reference to the rejection of claims.

A. I am not acquainted with the Secretary of the Interior, and of course he never suggested anything to me. I heard in October (in the fore part of October, I think), that the Secretary was dissatisfied with the action of the office in some cases; that is, that he thought the adjudicating division was rejecting cases which ought not to be rejected, and that he did not know any reason why cases should not be rejected by the board of review as they had been previously—that is, that the board of review should act upon all cases of rejection. In other words, it was the understanding that the Secretary did not approve of a chief of division or an assistant chief of division rejecting a claim upon a technicality, and wished that cases for rejection would be submitted to the board of review just precisely the same as cases for admission.

Q. In other words, the Secretary wished that the rule should be changed.

A. Yes; that was my understanding.

Q. What was the condition of the work in the board of review at the time?

A. I understood that the board of review at that time was in a crowded condition. I mean by that that the board had a great many cases which it had not been able to work up and which the reviewers had not been able to reach.

Q. In pursuance of this understanding of the wish of the Secretary of the Interior that cases should not be rejected except by the board of review, was not an order to that effect afterward issued?

A. Yes.

I need not pursue this point further. I leave it where the evidence leaves it, and am content that the sincere and impartial of all parties shall pass upon it.

I want to go now to the next point. It is said that Colonel Dudley went to Ohio to engage in political work. He did. Before he went he tendered his resignation. The fact that he had resigned was known everywhere. The news of the event went from one end of the Republic to the other.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman mean to say that he had resigned or had simply filed his resignation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I mean to say that he had resigned, his resignation to take effect by its terms on the 10th day of November following.

Mr. ROGERS. Exactly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I intend further to say that from that time forward he disconnected himself absolutely from the Pension Office except in a matter to which I shall call attention if my time does not expire before I get to it. I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me further. I assert that he resigned; and it was known by the country that he had resigned.

It is charged in the next place by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that Colonel Dudley, while performing political work at Columbus, made his headquarters in the pension paying office. I deny that such was the case. Just before Colonel Dudley went to Ohio for the purpose of taking charge of the political campaign there (which I confess he did), he went to that State with one of his sons to put him in college. For they grow great men in Ohio; they are indigenous to that soil. While there upon that business Colonel Dudley very naturally called at Columbus, where he was the guest of the pension agent; and while he was there gentlemen called on him socially and in no other way. When subsequently he went to Ohio to engage in the campaign he made his headquarters in the rooms of the Republican central committee and nowhere else.

Next, it is said that he continued to perform the duties of Commissioner after tendering his resignation; and my amiable friend and colleague [Mr. MATSON] refers to the Noble telegram. Why, sir, the Noble telegram was sent on the 5th of September before Colonel Dudley's resignation, and all there was in it was that he directed a special examiner, then in New York, to report for duty to a special examiner in Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would be glad to ask the gentleman whether he denies that Colonel Dudley returned to Washington and assumed the duties of Commissioner after his resignation had been sent in?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman had permitted me to continue I would have come to that point, for I have nothing to disguise in this case. I want to put in the RECORD the testimony of Mr. Clarke, the first assistant Commissioner, who says—and he certainly was not particularly friendly to Colonel Dudley—that during all the time Colonel Dudley was absent in Ohio he did not perform or assume to perform, so far as Mr. Clarke knew, any of the duties of the Commissioner of Pensions, except to sign one letter, perhaps inadvertently.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Did he not write a letter saying he was here to assume his duties?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Gentlemen, I give you what Major Clarke said:

Q. Did he act as Commissioner, or assume to act, while he was in Ohio and away from the office?

A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. Did he give any orders or directions in any way to any of the agents or officials of the office?

A. Not that I know of. It is possible that in some communication written to me he may inadvertently have signed his name as "Commissioner." I do not know that that is the fact at all, but it may have been so. If he did that, I do not know what force it might have; but I certainly did not regard it as official at all.

Q. Did he carry on correspondence with the office in his official capacity from Columbus, Ohio, during the time of his absence?

A. If he did, I did not so regard it. I can not tell what his motives may have been or what he intended to do, but I can say that I did not regard any communication that he may have written to me from there as official or as coming from him as Commissioner.

When he returned to Washington he did complete his official report. It was unfinished when he left. When he came back he did finish up some uncompleted business, which, however, began during the time he was in fact the Commissioner of Pensions; but he did no more than affix his signature and close up the business; that was all. It is true that he did receive his salary from the time he went to Ohio until the date when his resignation took effect. He did this with the consent of the authorities, and I assert he did it rightfully. I happen to know, what I believe many of my colleagues know, that long after the hour of 4 o'clock, when the ordinary employés of the Pension Office were at home, Colonel Dudley remained at his desk examining pension records. This work often extended into the weary vigils of the night. Indeed, it is my impression there was scarcely a night when his labors were not continued in this way long past office hours.

When he left the office it was his habit to take with him to his home voluminous records; and when other gentlemen were engaged in recreation he was endeavoring to adjust the demands of these men who had claims pending in his bureau. He performed more service in proportion to the pay he received than any other public servant ever did within my knowledge. I know of no officer who performed so much work or who had so large a responsibility as the Commissioner of Pensions, and I can say that of the office now as well as then. He received no penny he did not earn—fairly and honestly earn.

I must hasten on, for I have but a minute or two remaining. I want to refer to the charge that Colonel Dudley gave certain courtesies to Major Grubbs, who was the adversary candidate of my distinguished friend from the Greencastle district [Mr. MATSON]. Now, the first thing that strikes me as being novel about this alleged crime against propriety is that Colonel Dudley, sharp, calculating man as he is represented to be, should have left every word of that correspondence both from and to Major Grubbs on the permanent records of the Pension Office. It was put among the official papers, and those official papers are now given out, not only to be bandied about in the discussions of this question on this floor, but to be taken into the secret precincts of Democratic caucuses. Not only this, but the official correspondence, so far as I know, has been dug into from the top stratum to the very bottom in the hope that something would be found that would rise up in judgment against the late Commissioner of Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have never taken occasion, I believe, to address the House for a full hour in my life; and I hope, in consideration of the mercy I have shown, I may be allowed either to finish what I desire to say in this line, or to extend my remarks in print.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the time of the gentleman from Indiana may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow the gentleman from Indiana to go on now and finish his remarks.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I say frankly, while I am not anxious to be heard, I am anxious to complete this record.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to allowing the gentleman from Indiana to proceed now, if he can do so in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended.

Several MEMBERS. How long?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think I can get through in fifteen minutes. I will do the best I can. Let me have twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to granting an extension of twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana in his own right? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I come now, Mr. Chairman, to that part of the charge that Colonel Dudley interfered with the matter of election in the district of my distinguished colleague [Mr. MATSON]. I said it was a singular feature in this case that all the facts, that every line of correspondence so far as we know, is a part of the public record of the Pension Office. It is usual, I think, when crime is committed, or any transaction takes place in which the perpetrator is conscious there is wrong, the evidence of it is concealed. In this case, and I hope the example will be followed by the excellent gentleman who succeeds Colonel Dudley in this case, all the correspondence, even where it alludes to politics, has been left on file to be seen by all generations who are to come after us.

What is it? I can not in the time allowed me refer to all the evidence which is pertinent to the question at issue, but I will take leave to publish it with my remarks when they come to be printed. I want all the evidence in the RECORD bearing on this question, because I wish Colonel Dudley judged not by what gentlemen say about him in heated debate, but what the proof really shows.

I assert now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from that evidence that every one of these charges, so far as they assume to implicate Colonel Dudley of a partisan purpose, there is on the contrary not a shadow of proof to sustain them.

What are the facts? John M. Comstock is a man than whom no more honorable gentleman ever held office under a Republican or Democratic administration. My colleague, Mr. MATSON, knows to himself and myself he extended every courtesy we could ask. He never denied any to either of us. If he was not an exemplary gentleman, after an acquaintance of four or five years with him, then I must confess I am not a judge of human character.

Mr. Comstock testifies in this case that Colonel Dudley told him to extend to Major Grubbs all the courtesies he extended to members of Congress. Why not? Why, was not Major Grubbs an honorable man? Was he not like himself a distinguished soldier in the service of the United States? Was he not like my distinguished friend a candidate for Congress, and did he not receive that distinction by an expression of confidence at the hands of a large and respectable party? What was there wrong about it?

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman allow me to have a letter read?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I suppose it is one found last night after the adjournment?

Mr. MATSON. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will let the whole record be printed.

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman will yield to me I will have the letter read.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. You will have your opportunity. I do not care what it is. I undertake to say if the letter is there it is a part of the records of the Pension Office. I regret this whole correspondence did not fall into the hands of the President. He would have treated it as confidential. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MATSON. It has fallen into the hands of Cleveland, and we are now opening the books. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let me say to you, in the language of Holy Writ, another book will be opened before them, and those whose names are not found in it will be consigned to that place where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman allow me to have the letter read?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will not now, but will proceed with what I have to say. I was explaining that the courtesies of the Pension Office extended to any reputable citizen is not a breach of any duty imposed on the Commissioner of Pensions. It is just what he ought to do. I can call attention to Democrats and Republicans alike, not candidates for any office, to whom this privilege has been accorded. He did it generally to responsible gentlemen who were not in interest for or against a pending claim.

Oh! but it is said he furnished the official envelopes of the Pension Bureau to Major Grubbs. I assert that Mr. Comstock explicitly denied any such order. The language of the Commissioner was that Mr. Comstock should extend to Mr. Grubbs the courtesies usually accorded to members of Congress, and to answer his letters promptly. He denied it went further than that, although he interpreted that to include the furnishing of official envelopes. Colonel Dudley denies with emphasis, under oath, any such envelopes were sent with his knowledge or in pursuance of his instructions. But what if they were? Every claimant receives his communications from the office under their cover. They are thus sent to them through members of Congress and through agents and attorneys, and why not when passed through the hands of a citizen? In that case these envelopes simply subserve the purpose for which they were authorized by law.

But I deny that there is evidence upon the record from any living human being showing that any official envelope was sent to Major Grubbs by Colonel Dudley's direction. I admit that Major Grubbs was a Republican candidate for Congress, and that Colonel Dudley in that contest was in sympathy with him and hoped for his success, but I suppose it is quite as reputable and as much in the line of duty for a Republican Commissioner to grant the courtesies of his office for the purpose of forwarding the prospects of his political friends as it is for a Democratic Commissioner to spread all over the pages of an official report slander after slander and calumny succeeding calumny against his predecessor in office for the purpose of promoting the success of his own party. If gentlemen can stand by the one record, we will try to stand by the other.

This seems a proper place for the insertion of what was sworn to by Mr. Comstock and Colonel Dudley as to the Grubbs transaction. John M. Comstock said:

Q. State to the committee what you know about Mr. Grubbs having the privilege of calling up cases on Congressional blanks, and of having penalty-envelopes sent to him, inside of others, just the same as they are sent to members of Congress.

A. What I know in regard to that is that Mr. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions, told me that he was a friend of Mr. Grubbs; that there had been some calls made by Mr. Grubbs; that Mr. Grubbs was a candidate for Congress; and that he (Mr. Dudley) wished me, as a matter of courtesy, to see that these calls were answered. That was about all. I know nothing about penalty envelopes. He sent up Congressional slips.

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Who sent them up?

A. Mr. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions. They did not come from Mr. Grubbs. Mr. Dudley said that he wanted I should give them attention. He said that Mr. Grubbs was a candidate for Congress from the State of Indiana and was a friend of his; and I considered this in the shape of an order.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Mr. Dudley direct you to let Mr. Grubbs have penalty-envelopes?

A. No, sir; but I supposed that that followed. We treated him as if he were a member of Congress.

Q. Who was Mr. Grubbs running against?

A. I have learned that he was running against Mr. Matson.

Q. Did you know it at the time?

A. No, sir; but I learned it soon afterwards.

Q. Did you under those instructions allow Mr. Grubbs to call up cases on Congressional blanks, and did you send out penalty envelopes to him in the same manner as to members of Congress?

A. Certainly. I directed that Mr. Grubbs be treated exactly as a member of Congress. This was done by the direction of the Commissioner of Pensions and by no power of my own.

Q. I assume that if you did it you did it under the directions of somebody, and that you were simply carrying out your instructions?
A. Yes, sir; I carried out my instructions as well as I could in the ordinary way.

By Mr. HART:

Q. In that case Mr. Dudley directed you to treat Mr. Grubbs with the same courtesy as you would treat a member of Congress?
A. Yes.
Q. In carrying out that, Mr. Grubbs took such slips as we have had exhibited here, and made inquiries on them in reference to the conditions of pension claims?
A. I think so.
Q. That was your understanding?
A. Yes; I suppose so.
Q. And when these slips came in the condition of the case would be ascertained by the proper examiner?
A. Yes.
Q. And a letter written to the claimant?
A. Yes.
Q. And an official envelope directed to the claimant?
A. Yes.
Q. And that inclosed in an official envelope directed to Mr. Grubbs?
A. Yes.
Q. So that he can forward it to the claimant?
A. Yes.
Q. In other words, you did precisely with Mr. Grubbs as you would do with me if I sent an inquiry to the office?
A. Precisely.
Q. That is, the condition of the claim is ascertained?
A. Yes.
Q. And a statement of the condition is put in the form of a letter addressed to the claimant?
A. Yes.
Q. And that letter addressed to the claimant is inclosed in an envelope addressed to me?
A. Yes.
Q. And the letter to the claimant is put in an envelope addressed to him and inclosed in the envelope addressed to me?
A. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. You treated Mr. Grubbs just as you would treat Mr. Hart?
The WITNESS. Yes.

By Mr. HART:

Q. If a claim agent or an attorney or a private citizen of any sort were to write a letter to the Pension Office, in what kind of an envelope would the answer be returned?
A. In a penalty envelope.
Q. In the same kind of envelope which you use with Mr. Grubbs?
A. Yes.

The following is Colonel Dudley's statement:

Q. I wish to ask you some questions about Mr. Grubbs. You stated yesterday that you gave Mr. Grubbs the same right to call up cases that you gave to Mr. Matson.
The WITNESS. Did I say so?
The CHAIRMAN. I think so. Did you give him that right?
The WITNESS. No, I did not.
The CHAIRMAN. Then Mr. Comstock's testimony is not true?
The WITNESS. You are testifying when you say that. Mr. Comstock was instructed by me to answer Mr. Grubbs's inquiries as promptly as possible; and in answering them he was authorized to say that the answers were given at Mr. Grubb's request.
Q. Then you did not give instructions to allow Mr. Grubbs to call up cases on Congressional blanks?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. Did you authorize Mr. Comstock to inclose penalty envelopes to Mr. Grubbs?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. You did not authorize him to do that?
A. No, I did not.
Q. Did you authorize that in any case except to members of Congress and Government officials?
A. I never have authorized it in any other case than to members of Congress and Government officials.
Q. Then you did not auhtorize Mr. Comstock (I want that to come out plainly) to inclose answers to Mr. Grubbs in penalty envelopes and to allow him to call up cases on Congressional blanks?
A. No, sir; and Mr. Comstock did not say so in his testimony.

Here I leave this matter and pass from it to return to it no more. It did not deserve the consideration it has received.

Another thing, it is said in pursuance of this a board of examining surgeons was appointed at Major Grubbs's suggestion at the city of Martinsville. You have heard the correspondence in regard to that. There may have been an imprudent, or, if you please to put it so, an improper suggestion in the letter of Major Grubbs. The record is there; the country may judge of it; I do not care to discuss its terms. But let us come to the action of the commission, which is assailed. A board of surgeons was appointed at Martinsville. Should it have gone there? Colonel Dudley, in his response to Major Grubbs's letter, says that the matter shall be referred to the proper officials in the bureau; that their opinion shall be taken as to its propriety; and that if it is a proper thing to be done, it shall be done. Would any Commissioner have said less?

Oh, I wish we could turn inside out all the correspondence of all these Department bureaus during the last eight or ten months. I wish it could be revealed in the presence of the country, even the correspondence of this immaculate Bureau of Pensions, to see if some enthusiastic Democrat, in his zeal for pensions or office or something else, may not have made a remark as imprudent and censurable as any that is contained in this letter of Major Grubbs. And yet I would have infinite contempt for any Republican who, at some future time, to bolster up an assault against the reputation of the present Commissioner of Pensions (for whom I entertain the highest personal respect)—I say I would hold in contempt that Republican who would parade such a letter, if such should be found in the archives of the Department after the present Commissioner shall have gone hence and given place to some distinguished Republican soldier—I would hold in contempt the Republican who should bring such a letter in here as a pretext for making an assault upon the official conduct of the present Democratic Commissioner. This board, I say, was appointed. Was it improper? There is no such assertion. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is there yet, and the very fact that the present Commissioner continues it is a sufficient answer to any assumption on the part of the gentlemen on the other side that it was sent there for political purposes. If it was not then required by the exigencies of the service, then there might be some pretext for the charge that it was appointed for the purpose of aiding Major Grubbs in his political campaign.

Mr. MATSON. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MATSON. Does not my colleague know that they were all Republicans that were appointed on that board?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know, and the truth is, I can not find it in my heart to complain of the appointment of any reputable Republican to office. If any gentleman wants to attack any official for appointing Republicans to office, he has my permission to do so, but I can not join in the crusade. I will not complain if the present Commissioner of Pensions appoints two Democratic surgeons on an examining board and only one Republican, or if he appoints all Democrats. All I want him to do is to follow the example of his predecessor: first, find men of experience; secondly, men of character; and, thirdly, as far as may be, men who have seen service in the Union Army. When he has done that he may appoint Democrats if he wants to do so, and I will not attack him for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have gone over all these charges, so far as I know them, and so far as I have been able to ascertain from the records their character, and there is but one other thing to which I desire to call attention. That is a little fragment of evidence which does seem to implicate the Pension Bureau directly in an assault on the Democratic party. It is the testimony of Mr. Burton, which has been referred to here. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Q. State what Mr. Comstock said on the subject.
A. I went to him and asked as to the credibility of a claimant whose claim I had in my hands and who lived near Mr. Comstock's home, in the State of New York. I was employed in the eastern division. Mr. Comstock said that the man was a fair enough man, but a God damned Democrat, and that he did not want anything to do with him.
Q. Where was that conversation held?
A. In the western division of the Pension Office, Mr. Comstock's division.
Q. When was it?
A. I think it was in the month of April or May; I am not positive.
Q. Do you recollect the name of the case?
A. I do not recollect the name of the case. I had so many cases from that county that I do not recollect any.
Q. What was the name of the man that you inquired about?
A. I can not recollect.
Q. What kind of a looking man was this man whom Mr. Comstock spoke of as a "God damned Democrat?"
A. I don't know; he was a claimant.
Q. Then you can not remember the name of the case?
A. I can not remember the name of the case.
Q. Nor the name of the man whom you inquired about?
A. No, sir. If I went to the files and looked over the cases I could tell the name of the man. I had a good many cases from the county.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You went to Mr. Comstock because that man was from Mr. Comstock's town?
A. Yes.
Mr. HART. Be so good as to obtain for us the name of the man; do your best to get it.
WITNESS. I will.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The witness never furnished the name of that Democrat and never will. The anathematized man was a myth, existing only in the fertile imagination of Burton. He was anxious to do something for his new masters, and he did it. He has, I suppose, his reward, for such zeal as he displayed merits recognition. It is unnecessary to say that Comstock, under his oath, denounces the whole story as infamously false, for it bears on its face the evidence of its falsity.

The witness Burton was in the presence of the committee—and as he was never again summoned into its presence I take it for granted that both sides alike were disgusted at the exhibition he made of himself.

My want of time forbids my continuing this discussion. I have put in the record every material fact within my knowledge relating to this controversy. I care not to state conclusions, for the enlightened judgment of a just people will see to it that malignity shall not triumph. At every point Colonel Dudley stands vindicated, his character both as a citizen and a public servant untouched by the calumnies fulminated against him.

I conclude by thanking the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] for his kindness in surrendering to me so much of his time, and the committee for its patient and respectful hearing.

Mr. LONG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, retaining the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh, no.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It would be more agreeable to the gentleman from Ohio that the committee should now rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to proceed now.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Millitary Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 6395) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I reserve all points of order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GALLINGER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. E. B. TAYLOR, indefinitely.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of Congress the seventeenth annual report of the board of Indian commissioners for the year 1885, submitted to the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of the act of May 17, 1882.

The report accompanies the message to the House of Representatives.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1886.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, a statement of the amount of bonds called for payment April 1, 1886, held by the Treasurer of the United States in trust for national banks; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a recommendation for the printing of the schedules of the second, third, fourth, and tenth censuses of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the General Assembly of Ohio, instructing the Senators and requesting the Members of Congress from Ohio to support the bill for a marine hospital at Gallipolis, Ohio; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution instructing Ohio members in Congress to support certain bill therein pending.

Whereas a bill for the erection of a marine hospital at Gallipolis, Ohio, will come up for consideration by Congress at its present session; and

Whereas the said city of Gallipolis is the proper place for a marine hospital, for the following among other reasons: It is located about midway between Wheeling and Cincinnati; it is located above the highest water ever known in the Ohio River; for ten years past it has been a point for the inspection of steamers and licensing of steamboat officers; it is the terminus of ten steamers and steamboat lines, besides Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, Wheeling and Cincinnati, and Pomeroy daily packets, making not less than eighteen steamers daily doing business at the wharf; and

Whereas the number of steamboatmen in the district of which Gallipolis is the center reaches over 1,000, and for several years past the Government has had a temporary hospital at said place, which has been the source of great benefit to sick and disabled steamboatmen: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use all honorable means to secure such appropriation by Congress as may be necessary to erect a marine hospital at Gallipolis, Ohio; and the governor is hereby directed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOHN C. ENTREKEN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ROBERT P. KENNEDY,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the General Assembly of Ohio, instructing the Senators and requesting the Members of Congress from Ohio to favor the placing of a nautical training-ship on Lake Erie; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting the governor, and Senators and Representatives in Congress, to use their influence in having a training-ship placed on Lake Erie, for instructing the boys of the industrial schools of this State in nautical arts.

Whereas it is esteemed meet and proper that a portion of our citizens, as far as practicable, should be educated in the nautical arts, in order that our naval and mercantile vessels at sea may, as far as possible, be manned by citizens of our country; and

Whereas the Federal Government has supplied training-ships to some of the States, and officered the same for the training of the incorrigible boys committed to the reformatories of the States in the nautical arts: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the governor, and our Senators and Representatives in Congress, be and they are hereby respectfully requested to use their influence with the Federal Government in procuring the same advantages for the State of Ohio, and have placed on Lake Erie a training-ship for the training of such boys in the industrial school for boys as may be found adapted to that purpose.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be sent to the governor, and that he be respectfully requested to transmit copies thereof to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that they be requested to earnestly forward the purpose of this resolution.

DANIEL J. RYAN,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ROBERT P. KENNEDY,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 25, 1886.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Bangor, Me., praying that liberal appropriations of the surplus revenue be made for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and especially in favor of the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., and resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Buffalo, N. Y., favoring the passage of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate interstate commerce; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of the city of Davenport, Iowa, praying Congress to make liberal appropriations from the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and to redistribute among the people, in the form of wages, funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and on what they wear; also in favor of the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the National Government; and I present a like petition from the Knights of Labor of Clarinda, Iowa. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the West Branch Lumberman's Exchange, of Williamsport, Pa., remonstrating against a change of the tariff on lumber; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 4050, Knights of Labor, of Mahanoy City, Pa., praying that liberal appropriation be made for the construction of works of internal improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of 34 citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of appropriate legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON. I present a series of resolutions adopted by the Philadelphia (Pa.) Maritime Exchange, in reference to the Morrison tariff bill. I ask that the resolutions be read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

MARCH 1, 1886.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, held the 1st day of March, 1886, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of this exchange that in H. R. bill 5576, introduced by Mr. MORRISON, entitled "A bill to reduce tariff taxes," certain reductions are proposed on sugars, while no equivalent reduction is proposed or intended on molasses, which is to be left on the present basis; and

Whereas this exchange has reason to believe that such a discrimination as is proposed by Mr. MORRISON's bill would utterly destroy the molasses-boiling industry in this country; and

Whereas this industry is of great value to the shipping interests of this port, it having furnished inward cargoes last year alone to 178 vessels, of an average tonnage of 400 tons each, and a total tonnage of about 71,000 tons; the freight earnings of these vessels having been about $2,000 each, making a total of about $356,000; and

Whereas these vessels are almost exclusively American bottoms, and depend largely upon this business at certain seasons of the year: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this exchange enters its earnest protest against any such unjust change in the sugar schedule as the one proposed in H. R. bill 5576, as injurious alike to our Philadelphia industries and maritime interests, as also to the general welfare of our American coastwise marine.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the House of Representatives from Philadelphia and to the two Senators from Pennsylvania. Also, that copies be furnished to the press.

WM. BROEKIE, President.

Attest:

EDWD. SHARWOOD, Secretary.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of 9 clergymen, 15 physicians, 5 lawyers, 15 teachers, 56 business men, and 32 officers of temperance and other societies, citizens of Marshall, Kosciusko, and Saint Joseph Counties, Indiana, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of Wilmington Harbor, and asking also for the establishment of a district court of the United States at that place and the erection of a public building. There are three subjects, each of which should go to a different committee. I will move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as the establishment of a court would precede the erection of a building; and as to the commercial feature of the petition, I shall leave that undisposed of at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Schenectady, N. Y.; a petition of Knights of Labor of Johnstown, N. Y.; and a petition of Knights of Labor of Buffalo, N. Y., praying that a liberal appropriation be made for public works, and favoring the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Watertown Grange, Watertown, N. Y., praying that the rate of postage on fourth-class mail matter be reduced; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS. I present house concurrent resolution No. 25 of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, relating to the enlargement of the soldiers' home located at Leavenworth, Kans., which I ask, in accordance with the custom, may be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be priated, as follows.

House concurrent resolution No. 25, relating to the enlargement of the soldiers' home located at Leavenworth, Kans.

Whereas the western branch of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers has been established for the relief and a home for such of the disabled volunteer soldiers in the States of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Colorado, and other States, as may, by reason of their infirmities, contracted while in the service of their country, need the protection and care of the General Government; and

Whereas the preparations for the care of such disabled volunteer soldiers, by reason of the recent establishment of this home, are insufficient and incomplete, and the managers of this home are daily compelled to refuse admission to disabled volunteer soldiers who are worthy the care of such a home; and

Whereas there is now need for buildings and accommodations for at least three thousand more disabled and worthy volunteer soldiers from the States above named than can be cared for when the buildings now in process of construction are completed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to secure, if practicable, an appropriation for the enlargement of this branch of the soldiers' home sufficient for the construction of buildings and for the accommodation of not less than three thousand more applicants than the present buildings and improvements will admit.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each one of our Senators and Representatives by the secretary of state, and that a like copy be sent by him to each of the governors of the States named, requesting concurrence of action by their respective States in this philanthropic movement.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution now on file in my office, and that the same was adopted by the house of representatives on the 10th day of February, and concurred in by the senate on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1886.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka this 22d day of February, A. D. 1886.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Hiawatha and Scranton, Kans., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of many citizens, property-holders and residents of Washington, praying for legislation concerning the steam-railroads within the city of Washington, and for the establishment of a union depot, as provided in what is known as the Vance-Harris bill now pending before this body. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Johnstown, Buffalo, and Schenectady, N. Y., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the suspension of the compulsory coinage of the silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of old soldiers and representative business men, citizens of Bradford, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 927, to extend the benefits of the act approved March 3, 1879, and the act of March 3, 1885, to certain pensioners whose disabilities are caused by amputation, and increasing the rate therefor, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL. I present a letter addressed to me, which is in the nature of a petition, and properly goes to the Committee on Public Lands, from D. D. Crews, jr., of Popash, Manatee County, Florida, in relation to certain alleged improper State selections of swamp and overflowed land interfering with homestead settlement under the laws of the United States. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present also a letter in the nature of a petition from the Board of Trade of the city of Jacksonville, Fla., praying for the passage of a bill establishing a telegraph line and signal station at Point Jupiter, Florida, in the interest of commerce. I move the reference of the paper to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of John L. Robinson and 74 others, citizens of Walton County, Florida; a petition of 54 citizens of Cerro Gordo, Holmes County, Florida; a petition of 88 citizens of Summerfield, Holmes County, Florida, and a petition of 28 citizens of Freeport, Walton County, Florida, praying for the forfeiture of the land grant made by the United States in 1850 to the State of Florida for the construction of railroads; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Day before yesterday my colleague [Mr. DOLPH] presented a number of petitions, numerously signed by citizens of Oregon, in which were set out the importance of the early completion of the improvements of Yaquina Bay, Oregon; and a copy of one of the petitions presented by him at that time was inserted in the RECORD. I now present additional petitions, containing the names of 2,230 citizens of Oregon, relating to the same subject. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a petition of the common council of the city of Portland, Oreg., praying favorable and speedy action on Senate bill No. 1111, to set apart certain townships in that State in which is located Crater Lake as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States, to the end that the said bill may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Colorado concerning public lands, and I call the attention of the Committee on Public Lands to the memorial. In all the railroad grants there were excepted from the grants lands to which pre-emption and homestead rights had attached. It was held by the Department for many years that on the abandonment of such pre-emption or homestead rights the lands reverted to the railroads. In 1882 the Department changed that ruling, and held that the lands went to the United States and not to the railroads. Since that time the Supreme Court of the United States have affirmed the view of the Department in 1882. That leaves a great number of people in possession of lands they had purchased from railroad companies many years ago. The Legislature of Colorado in this memorial prays for some legislation upon the subject in order that the bona fide purchasers from railroad companies who have lost their rights of pre-emption and homestead may be protected.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANFORD presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the establishment of a United States district court at that place, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the erection and maintenance of a Government building in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., praying increased appropriation for the improvement of Wilmington Harbor, Cal.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Newton, Jones' Shaft, Chicago, and America, Ill., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of the heirs of Carey H. Davis, late private Company H, Seventy-seventh Regiment Ohio Infantry, praying that they be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the assembly of Knights of Labor of Bangor, Me., praying for legislation in favor of public works and internal improvements, and indorsing the plan for the construction of the Hennepin Canal by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of 17 clergymen, 13 physicians, 11 lawyers, 59 teachers, 213 business men, and 47 officers of temperance and other societies, citizens of Todd, Stearns, Polk, Douglas, and Crow Wing Counties, Minnesota, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition which was forwarded to my colleague [Mr. VEST], who is indisposed and unable to be present in the Chamber. It is a petition of the Local Assembly No. 1528 of the Knights of Labor at Trenton, Grundy County, Missouri, praying that liberal appropriations be made for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance, and indorsing the proposed construction of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1418) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to provide libraries for the use of crews of vessels, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill making an appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase and proper care, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of suitable libraries for the use of the crews of vessels of war; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1417) to provide for the deposit of the savings of seamen of the United States Navy;

A bill (S. 1527) to provide a temporary home for certain persons discharged from the United States Navy; and

A bill (S. 1591) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upward," approved February 14, 1885, so that the same shall apply to the United States Navy.

Mr. HALE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1525) to require the testing of chains and anchors and for the better securing of life and property on shipboard, to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I wish to call the attention of that committee to the action of the Naval Committee. While the committee is in favor of the project, it seemed that it more fittingly belonged to the Committee on Commerce, because it deals not with the Navy, but with the commercial marine of the country.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 300) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 255) to provide for the deposit in the Treasury of the receipts of the money-order system and for the payment of its expenses out of appropriations, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 332) for the relief of John Fraser, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and he submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1771) for the relief of John Fraser; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 721) to establish a national live-stock highway and to promote commerce in live-stock between the States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 64) to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters and to protect public works against trespass or injury, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 901) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 236) to authorize the Bellingham Bay Railway and Navigation Company to build certain bridges in the Territory of Washington, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOLPH. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 902) confirming to W. S. Byers & Co. the right to take and use water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, for manufacturing purposes, to report it adversely. There was a bill for the same purpose referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and reported favorably, and it has been under consideration during the morning hour. That is the reason why this bill is reported adversely. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SEWELL. I report, by direction of a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will submit the views of the minority.

Mr. LOGAN. I pray leave to submit the views of the minority, and ask sufficient time to prepare the paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the Senator from Illinois will file the views of the minority hereafter.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1772) providing for the purchase of "the Capron collection of Japanese works of art," now on temporary deposit in the National Museum; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 982) granting the right of way to the Wyoming Central Railway Company across the Fort Fetterman military reservation, in the Territory of Wyoming, have directed me to report it back asking to be discharged, and move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands. It is one of the grants that seems to be embraced in the law.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the deficiency appropriation bill to pay to the legal representatives of Henry Highland Garnet, deceased, late minister resident and consul-general to Liberia, $445.40 on account of salary; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE GRANT COLLECTION.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 46) accepting from William H. Vanderbilt and Julia Dent Grant objects of value and art presented by various foreign governments to the late General Ulysses S. Grant, to report it favorably, without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The preamble recites that William H. Vanderbilt and Julia Dent Grant, by deed of trust executed on the 10th of January, 1885, presented to the United States certain swords, medals, paintings, bronzes, portraits, commissions, and addresses, and objects of value and art presented by various governments in the world to General Ulysses S. Grant as tokens of their high appreciation of his illustrious character as a soldier and a statesman. By the joint resolution the United States accept, with grateful acknowledgments, the property and articles more fully described in the schedule attached to the deed of trust, to be held by the United States and preserved and protected in the city of Washington for the use and inspection of the people of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the frame be changed so as to make it a bill, in order to have harmony in the statutes.

Mr. SEWELL. There will be no objection to that, I presume.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely a resolve, and nothing else.

Mr. INGALLS. It has to be signed by the Speaker of the House and the President.

Mr. HOAR. Still it is a resolution of thanks. The whole subject is only a resolution of thanks.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not worth while talking about it. If the Senator from Massachusetts objects, let it go.

Mr. HOAR. I think a joint resolution is the proper form.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well. If the Senator knows all about it, let it go.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator having the joint resolution in charge whether it would not be a little more appropriate to have the names transposed, so as to accept the gift from Mrs. Julia Dent Grant and Mr. William H. Vanderbilt? Of course I wish to have the joint resolution passed, but I think it would be in a little better taste to transpose the names, and I make that suggestion.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to that. It seems to be appropriate. The committee reported the resolution just as it was referred to them.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. I have no criticism to make on the committee. I merely make that suggestion.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the names will be transposed as suggested.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution accepting from Julia Dent Grant and William H. Vanderbilt objects of value and art presented by various foreign governments to the late Ulysses S. Grant."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1773) for the relief of Lieut. J. McA. Webster, of the Twenty-second Infantry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1774) for establishing a model farm and school of agriculture for Indians in Northwestern Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1775) for the relief of Eliza Ellen Ehle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1776) for the relief of William H. Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1777) for the relief of William C. McKay, of Pendleton, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1778) for the relief of the heirs of James Sinclair, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a bill (S. 1779) for the relief of John P. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1780) to provide for the payment of Alfred A. Fisher for the rent of certain property in Tallahassee, Fla., for the use of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1781) for the relief of Mary E. Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1782) to place Jeremiah Phelan, late hospital steward, United States Army, on the retired-list; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I know nothing at all about the merits of this bill and introduce it by request. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1783) granting an increase of pension to George Bliss; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1784) to amend the record of military service of Seth Bonney; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. This bill I present by request. I have not been informed as to the facts about it. I move that it be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 52) authorizing and directing the Postmaster-General to pay the postal clerks of the Railway Mail Service of classes 4 and 5 the increased salary provided for by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department," &c., approved March 3, 1885; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REMOVAL OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate how many fourth-class postmasters have been removed in each State and Territory since March 4, 1885.

CAPT. NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I notice that on yesterday the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR], from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely the bill (S. 42) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, and that the bill was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered, and the bill be placed on the Calendar. I wish to present some reasons why I think the claim should be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order indefinitely postponing the bill will be reconsidered, and it will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee. The Chair hears no objection and that order is made.

CHARLES A. SIBLEY.

Mr. CALL. Some days since there was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims by the Senator form Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] the bill (S. 918) for the relief of Charles A. Sibley, guardian of Lloyd M. Stevens, and it was indefinitely postponed without my observation. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill named by him was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, with a view to its being placed on the Calendar with the adverse report. If there be no objection that order will be made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I ask leave to make a brief statement in consequence of my attention having been called this morning to a publication in which there appears language which does not appear in the RECORD, and which has been construed to be offensive personally to some Senators, especially to the Senator from North Carolina.

I take this occasion to say voluntarily that if he shall find anything in the RECORD that is in any way offensive to him, and will point it out, I shall see that it is erased before we have the revised edition; for I did not mean to do him any injustice or to reflect upon him in any manner. I had but one object, and that was to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while we have closed doors as against the whole country we ought not to open them to professional lobbyists who come here to gather information, to persuade Senators if they can, to abuse them if they can not persuade them, and to blackguard them if they can not do either.

I meant no offense to any Senator, and I merely say to the Senator from North Carolina that if anything appears in the RECORD that he so construes I will see that it is erased.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 368) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882;

A bill (H. R. 1027) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me.;

A bill (H. R. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.; and

A bill (H. R. 5547) for the erection of a public building at Savannah, Ga.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the school bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not desire to interfere with the early close, as soon as possible, of the consideration of the bill which the Senator from New Hampshire has in charge, but I was in hopes that we could this morning have had a little time to devote to the Calendar. Would it not suit the Senator's purpose as well to take up the educational bill at 2 o'clock?

Mr. BLAIR. I think we shall get on with the public business faster by first completing the consideration of the school bill. I insist on my motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator consent this morning——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am merely appealing to the Senator from New Hampshire; that is all.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that my motion be put, and then if it be necessary to waive it informally for a few moments I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator from New Hampshire will listen to a suggestion——

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the unfinished business be placed before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be announced by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. Now I will hear the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I call the attention of the Senate to a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands to confirm entries of lands heretofore made under the land laws of the United States. The Senator will remember that the bill passed the committee without opposition.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to yield for the consideration of the bill indicated.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There will probably be no discussion upon it here.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall assist the Senator at any other time in obtaining the consideration of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill will probably elicit no discussion here. Does not the Senator think so? The friends of the measure are very anxious to get it to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska make a motion to that effect?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like the Senator from New Hampshire to consent. I do not desire to interfere with the educational bill. The bill I wish to get up will produce no discussion.

Mr. BLAIR. If the bill does not lead to discussion, I consent. If it leads to discussion, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands, and it meets the approbation of the Commissioner of the Land Office, who has written a letter on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to informally proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1319) to confirm entries of lands heretofore made under the land laws of the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. I object. The proper request would be that the pending business be laid aside informally, and I reserve the right to object to the bill if it leads to discussion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the unfinished business be laid aside informally with a view to take up the bill indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He must ask unanimous consent to lay aside the school bill informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. I object, and ask the Senate to proceed with the unfinished business. I shall assist the Senator from Nebraska at any other time in getting the consideration of the land bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill (S. 137) to increase the efficiency of the infantry branch of the Army, which has been reported from the Military Committee, is of very great importance, and I wish to have an opportunity of calling it up for action by the Senate as soon as I can. I do not wish to interfere with any matter now before the Senate, but hereafter, as soon as I can do so, I shall ask the consent of the Senate to consider the bill. I do not think it will take very long to get through with it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment will be read.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before that is done I will move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the school bill, the Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension bill indicated by him. The question is on agreeing to that motion. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide, and the ayes were 10.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I have been very anxious that the educational bill should be finished, so that we might go on——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind Senators that by an express rule of the Senate this question is not open to debate.

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, and that is, whether, if the motion prevails, the consideration of the pension bill would continue beyond 2 o'clock?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it would if taken up by the order of the Senate, the school bill being now pending, and the pension bill displacing it would continue until it was disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Chair will allow me to continue my inquiry of the Chair, if this motion should prevail would not the educational bill, so called, come up at 2 o'clock as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not prepared to decide that at the moment. When the question arises he will do so.

Mr. INGALLS. That controls my vote, and that is the reason why I make the inquiry. I should like to know about that. I want the educational bill to come up at 2 o'clock, and I should like to continue the consideration of the pension bill between now and that time, and I ask the opinion of the Chair upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the school bill would not come up at 2 o'clock. If the school bill, now being up, is postponed by a vote, the Chair is of opinion that it would not come up again at 2 o'clock; but upon that question the Chair is not entirely certain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair's impression is clearly right.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska to modify his motion so as to take up the pension bill under the eighth rule, and then I think it would be agreed to. Let us take it up under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the bill is taken up on motion, it will be taken up open to general debate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not think it would be prudent at this time to do as the Senator from New Jersey suggests. The bill has sufficient merit, and it is necessary that it should be acted upon——

Mr. BLAIR. I object to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will state that at 2 o'clock I will consent to suspend the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I was going to suggest.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will consent that at 2 o'clock the educational bill shall come up.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall have to object to any arrangement that would interfere with the consideration of the school bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLUMB], who is detained from the Chamber to-day by illness, advised me this morning that he is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. If my colleague were present, I presume he would vote "yea" on the pending motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], as his colleague has stated, he being opposed to the educational bill and I being in favor of it. I am paired with him on all propositions relating to the bill, leaving his colleague [Mr. INGALLS] as the arbiter.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is absent on committee service, and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Cameron,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Chace,	Harris,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Logan,	Sewell,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—28.

Berry,	Colquitt,	Hoar,	Pike,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Blair,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gray,	Maxey,	Stanford,
Call,	Hale,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Coke,	Hampton,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—28.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Mahone,	Platt,
Allison,	Frye,	McPherson,	Plumb,
Beck,	George,	Miller of Cal.,	Riddleberger,
Butler,	Gorman,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sabin,
Camden,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Vance,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Vest,
Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Voorhees,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to section 1:

And provided further, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any State until three-fourths of all the States have so accepted the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his named was called). On all matters concerning this bill I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is away, as we all know, on account of the death of his wife. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. PIKE (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions connected with this bill with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], whom I do not see in his seat.

Mr. INGALLS (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY (after having voted in the affirmative). I forgot that I am paired on the final passage of the bill with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], and perhaps the pair will be understood to include amendments; and, therefore, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is sick, and paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If my colleague were present, I think he would vote "yea" on this proposition.

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. He is absent on account of family affliction. The understanding between him and me was that whenever I did not know how he would vote on an amendment I might vote if I thought proper; but as I see most of the Senators on this side who act with him are voting for this amendment, I prefer to withdraw my vote in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Cameron,	Cullom,	Ingalls,	Van Wyck,
Chace,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Gray,	Maxey,
Coke,	Hale,	Platt,
Conger,	Harris,	Teller,

NAYS—29.

Berry,	Eustis,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	George,	Logan,	Spooner,
Blair,	Gibson,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,

Evarts,	McPherson,	Plumb,
Fair,	Mahone,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has also submitted another amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following:

Until and including the year 1890, and afterward according to the census of 1890: Provided, That the district of Alaska shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act; and the money apportioned to said District shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the manner provided for the expenditure of other appropriations for educational purposes in said District, and for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be apportioned to said District the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that that literally would extend the present arrangement to 1890 only. There may be a very considerable interval between the beginning of the year 1890 and the time when the census returns as to illiteracy are tabulated and made known.

Mr. DOLPH. It is "until and including."

Mr. HOAR. I know; but I should think it would be better to say until the returns of the census of 1890 are completed. I suppose that it will be more than a year, far into 1891, before those results are ascertained.

Mr. DOLPH. This reads "until and including the year 1890;" it includes that year.

Mr. HOAR. But that would not be long enough. I would suggest to the Senator, "until the publication by the census office of the illiteracy under the census of 1890."

Mr. LOGAN. This amendment is offered to section 2. I desire to offer a substitute for section 1 before that is passed on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senator's amendment relates to the amendment now pending it would not be in order at this moment.

Mr. LOGAN. That is offered to section 2 of the bill; and before we pass from section 1 I should like to offer the amendment I propose to that section. If the Senator from Oregon will withdraw his amendment for a moment I can do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon can withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Do I understand that action on the amendment offered by me would prevent an amendment to section 1?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; only it would be going back, and I thought as we went along the amendments would be better offered to perfect the sections in order; but I have no objection to having this amendment acted on.

Mr. DOLPH. I will withdraw for the present until it can be put in shape the first portion of my amendment, and prepare it afterward, down to the word "provided;" and I will offer the rest of it in regard to Alaska, which, as I wish to leave the Senate for a few moments to go to a train, I should like to have acted on now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon modifies his amendment so that it will stand as it will now be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2:

Provided, That the District of Alaska shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act; and the money apportioned to said District shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the manner provided for the expenditure of other appropriations for educational purposes in said District; and for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be apportioned to said District the Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that it seems to me this is introducing something incongruous in this scheme of education. Indian education is a very different thing from the education of the children in the States. If this amendment should prevail, it would be quite uncertain how much the District of Alaska would receive for educational purposes, and when we come to consider the Indian appropriation bill, which would naturally contain an appropriation for education in Alaska, it would be used as a reason either for omitting any appropriation there altogether or for diminishing the appropriation that is made; and as the Government under the present system is required to appropriate directly for Indian schools, it seems to me that the cause of education in Alaska will be advanced by pursuing that practice, instead of making the uncertain, indefinite appropriation which would be made under the provisions of this amendment, and which, as I have suggested, will probably be considered by the Committee on Appropriations as a reason why they should omit an appropriation for schools in Alaska. They could not tell how much Alaska would get or when it would be received, and in that way they would be compelled to duplicate the appropriation for education there, possibly making it excessive, or we should be liable to the other danger, that they would withhold a necessary appropriation, and the schools in Alaska would be unprovided for for a time.

This introduces the subject of Indian education, which is not a matter in charge of the States at all. The bill is directed to education within the States, that system and scheme of public education which has been in charge of the States. Now we come to deal with a question which the United States Government always deals with; and it seems to me that it is incongruous to insert it here, and that, instead of accomplishing a benefit to the schools of Alaska, it may very possibly result in serious detriment.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. There are other children besides Indian children of school age in Alaska Territory.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; there is of course a small number of white children there, and if it is limited to the education of such upon any school system of course it is entirely appropriate.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no system of schools now provided by law for the white children of Alaska.

Mr. HARRISON. We have, of course, no legislative authority to establish any system of schools in Alaska, and any appropriation there for education, whether of Indians or of white children, must be a direct appropriation by the General Government.

Mr. DOLPH. It is thought by several members of the Senate that the bill as it stands leaves the question unsettled as to whether or not Alaska is included.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is more than doubtful whether Alaska is described under the word "Territory" used in the bill; but the difference between the situation in Alaska and in the Territories is this: In all of our Territories we have Legislatures, and we have an organized school system, and we have local taxation for the support of schools; but in Alaska we have no legislative authority whatever—Congress must do all the legislation for Alaska—and therefore it seems to me that, even as to white children there, a direct appropriation for the establishment of schools would be more appropriate and perhaps more efficient.

I sympathize with the purpose of the Senator from Oregon; I would not like to have these people left with deficient opportunities of education; but my suggestion is that perhaps we can better reach this directly in some appropriation bill rather than by incorporating it here.

Mr. DOLPH. One more question. Ought not the bill to be made certain that Alaska either is included or excluded from its provisions?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is certain. When I said it was more than doubtful, I meant to express the opinion that it would not be included. If it is included at all, it certainly would not be included as an appropriation for Indian schools; and as the Senator's amendment provides for the expenditure of this appropriation in the same manner provided by law for the expenditure of other appropriations for education in other districts, and as there is no such present appropriation except for Indians, it seemed to me that the amendment would limit it to an appropriation for Indian schools.

I only make the suggestion; I am not strenuous about it; but it seemed to me we could deal with that question better hereafter, as it relates to the Indians, if we dealt with it by a direct appropriation, to be expended of course under the Government of the United States as it would be expended, because this only amounts to that. We say we withhold from the total amounts named in this bill so much which we will spend ourselves for education in Alaska. It is just as well to add the necessary appropriation instead of withholding it, as it seems to me. Of course I may be wrong.

Mr. TELLER. It is true that the Territory of Alaska, as it is called in the appropriation acts of last year and the year before, has no Teritorial Legislature, but it has a sort of government established two years ago by an act of Congress. In that there was no provision for schools, but in acts making appropriations there was a provision in one act for $25,000, and in another, as I recollect, for $15,000, making $40,000 appropriated for school purposes in the District or Territory of Alaska, whichever you choose to call it.

The Department at that time, after careful examination, found that the sum was so small that it would be practically of no benefit whatever; that by the time school-houses were built in the different sections of the country where there was a demand for schools there would be nothing left to maintain the schools. Therefore the Department entered into a contract, sometimes with the missionary organizations and societies that had attempted some years prior to the effort on the part of the Government to furnish school facilities to educate the children of both the natives and such American children as have gone into Alaska. The appropriation that the Senator is afraid will be cut off is about worthless, for it has been demonstrated in the last two years, as I say, that unless the Government is prepared to put in more that $40,000 it might as well practically abandon the schools there.

When we received from the Russian Government, a government not particularly noted for its zeal in behalf of public education, we received a great number of not entirely uneducated people. The Government of Russia had provided school facilities in all the principal villages of that country, and to-day men who both read and write, who were taught under the Russian Government, are seeing their children growing up in ignorance beyond the possibility of sending them to a school either public or private, and what they really had at the expense of the Russian Government when it was in control has been denied to them by this Government that makes such a boast of its zeal and progress in the cause of education.

It has been left ever since the accession of this District or Territory to the United States for the Committee on Appropriations to provide. It is pretty apparent that the committee have not done and will not do the necessary work for that District; and when we are providing for all classes of people I can not see why the people of Alaska and why the people of the Indian country ought not to be included. I made an effort the other day to have the Indians included. It was pretty apparent from the vote of the Senate that that was not desired. I thought then, and I think now, that possibly the Territory of Alaska is included in the bill, but, as the Senator from Oregon says, it ought to be made definite and certain.

Forty thousand dollars will be nothing practically, and if these people should receive a considerable sum of money under this bill there will be plenty of opportunities for the Appropriations Committee to continue the meager and poor appropriations that they have extended to these people. There are not only Indians in that country, but there are white people; and the Indians of Alaska, especially the shore Indians and the island Indians, are of an entirely different class from those Indians that we are generally called upon to provide for.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the honorable Senator what is the number of whites in Alaska?

Mr. TELLER. I would not undertake to say. It is comparatively small, but increasing all the time. It is increasing quite rapidly. There are some gold mines that have recently been discovered; and since we have established a government there—not a very good one, but one under which there is some sort of law at least and the people can have an organized civilized community—there is a disposition on the part of a great many people to go there to mine. I have been informed recently by a Senator who has spent some time there examining into the capabilities of that country that it promises to be a very rich mining region. As soon as that is thoroughly understood on the Pacific coast, in the mining States, it will be filled up with people; and I think this is a fitting and proper occasion for the Government of the United States to provide for this outlying country that pays to the Government an income of $300,000 every year; and we have grudgingly spent, I believe, $40,000 or $50,000 in the last two years, or less than that, for the purposes of government, and about $40,000 for schools. There are a number of schools established and maintained now, and have been for several years, by missionary effort; and but for the fact that those schools were in existence it would have been impossible for the Department to have utilized the money appropriated for schools in that district.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow the Chair to present a letter from the Secretary of the Interior on this subject-matter, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 3, 1886.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution of the 15th ultimo, I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of Sheldon Jackson on education in Alaska.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

To the PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the reason why the proposition of the Senator from Colorado to include Indians under the benefits of this bill was rejected was not because money expended through this agency for education would be less valuable to them than money expended by direct appropriation from Congress, but it was because you can not mingle together two different systems and appropriate money through different channels and under different regulations and apply them to Indians, and that difficulty exists in reference to extending the provisions of this bill over Alaska. All the money that can be expended possibly in Alaska, probably in the next fifteen years, aside from benevolent expenditures of private citizens, must come from the Treasury of the United States, and it does seem to me the height of folly to undertake to expend that through different means and under different plans. You had better expend it entirely through this bill or entirely through independent appropriations, as has been attempted.

It is true that through the Committee on Appropriations there was appropriated $40,000 in the last Congress for educational purposes in Alaska. That it has been of little or no use in Alaska is not because it was only $40,000 and is not because it came through the Committee on Appropriations, but it is because of a conflict which existed in that Territory between the officials in different branches of the administration of affairs in Alaska. I do not care to criticise these officers or to say upon whom of them more blame than upon others ought to rest; but when the report that has just come here from Sheldon Jackson shall be printed, I think all Senators will see that the trouble arose from the unfortunate temperament and disposition and ideas of different officials that went out there. Scholars were taken out of the schools on writs of habeas corpus by the judge who was sent out there upon the application of the natives, and all control and restraint over the scholars was nullified and paralyzed by the different views and policies. I am not here to criticise, as I have said, either of these; but that was the difficulty.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator when these occurrences took place?

Mr. DAWES. They took place in the past, and they took place after the appropriation was made; and as long as it is not a matter that I desire to criticise any individual about, I do not care to find out whether it was an appointee of the present administration or an appointee of the past. I do not lay anything at the door of the past administration in this matter. It arises somewhat from the peculiar exigencies and the peculiar location of that far-off region about which and about the necessities of which and about the best method of appropriating money for educational purposes there we know so little; and if we knew ever so much we should find great difficulty at this distance in prescribing the particular method of expending the moneys appropriated.

Now, if you appropriate it through this bill, you must conform the appropriation to that which is applicable to all the States of the Union—to Massachusetts and to Colorado; and yet that far-off region is as unlike either Massachusetts or Colorado as its people are unlike the Hottentots or the Congo people; and why should we attempt it? Why is it better to get a little through this bill and then eke out the rest of it through the Committee on Appropriations than it is to say at once in the regular appropriation bill we can afford to or we ought to appropriate so much, and we ought to put it under special and particular restrictions, or else we ought to put it (which is wiser) in the absolute discretion of some discreet and wise man who knows what to do with the money there. I know it will be difficult to find such a man. I am not standing here in defense of the man who has made that report which has come here or to say that his attempt to expend that $40,000 was the wisest. I only mean to say that you can not put a dollar into this bill for Alaska under the system of this bill which, in my opinion, will be worth anything in Alaska. Yet a dollar which comes from this source ought to be worth just as much as a dollar from any other source, as it all comes from the Treasury of the United States.

Let us attempt to redeem our pledge made when we obtained Alaska; let us attempt to blot out that striking contrast which exists to-day between the fate and fortune and future of those people who came from half-benighted Russia under our care and of our own enlightened free people; let us address ourselves to remedying the condition they are found in after twenty years of experiment, not under this general system, but under some special legislation that shall have the advantage of a clearer knowledge of the condition and the necessities of these people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, of course I can not say as to what has occurred in Alaska within the last year. It is a year and a day since I have had any more opportunity to know about that than other Senators. It is possible that everything the Senator from Massachusetts says has occurred. If so, it has occurred since my connection with the Interior Department.

The statement I made was that there was not sufficient money. Therefore when the Commissioner of Education, to whom the matter was referred, had laid out a plan for the schools of Alaska, it was discovered that the money was insufficient to do the work, and thereupon it was determined to be a necessity that he should simply aid the schools already established by charity. That was done, and I believe that was the wise thing to do at that time. How well it has succeeded I do not know.

I think perhaps the fault arises in Alaska from the fact that there is a nondescript government there. It is unlike any other government in the world. It is not one that we ought to be proud of. It was established in the interest of economy, to save the expense of a few dollars, to give to those people a government such as we never gave to any other people, when we were pledged by our treaty with Russia to give them such a government as we gave to other citizens of the United States and to treat them in a proper manner.

I do not understand why it is that the Senator lays so much stress on the notion that you have two systems. Who appropriates the money? The magnificent sum that the Appropriations Committee have given or expect to give the Secretary of the Interior is the amount that you appropriate, and whether it comes through this bill or whether it comes through the Committee on Appropriations does not make any difference.

In either case the same hand doles it out, the same power controls it, the same authority determines every question, whether it comes through this bill or through the other. I know that it may be a reflection upon the Committee on Appropriations to declare that they have not been exceedingly liberal; and when the question was before the Senate more than one Senator said on this floor, "we make proper and suitable appropriations for Indian education."

Mr. President, I hold before me the reports of the several agents of the United States made in 1884, and you may go through the volume and you will find that they are all complaining of a lack of suitable facilities. "Fifteen hundred Indians," says one agent, "who have been agricultural and house-living Indians for three hundred years, are without the opportunity of sending their children to school." Seventeen thousand Indians on another reservation had only five or six thousand dollars that could be expended for their benefit, and wanted money to erect public buildings for the education of those children; and yet it is said liberal appropriations are made! It is not true, Mr. President.

If there is any single instance where the Government of the United States has failed in its duty, it is with reference to the educatian of the Indian race; and when an attempt is made to simply put them upon an equality with the other people of the United States, it is said that you are attempting to introduce into this bill a system that will destroy the whole beauty of this grand enterprise for the education of the American children. Who need it more than the Indian children? Who has suffered more from the want of education than the Indians? I have said before all I need to say upon that subject. I understand that the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations have been dealing with the subject and are prepared to deal with it; but they have not dealt in such a munificent manner that they need to say that everything has been done which ought to have been done. Judging from the past, they will not do much better in the future than they have done in the past.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this question. I am not insisting, whatever the Senator from Massachusetts may have done, that the appropriations for education in Alaska have been sufficient.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I have never uttered a word on this floor during the years I have served here that bears the interpretation which either the Senator from Colorado has put or the Senator from Indiana is about to put upon my position. Everybody who knows me knows that I have tired the ear of the Senate imploring more liberal and greater appropriations for the Indians and for Alaska. The Senator knows very well that I stood with him to make $15,000 $25,000 in the very bill to which he alludes.

Mr. HARRISON. I was not imputing any such position to the Senator from Massachusetts, but was only referring to what the Senator from Colorado had said, that the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Indian Affairs had claimed that they had been munificent in these appropriations. I simply said that whatever the Senator from Massachusetts or any other member of the Committee on Appropriations might say, I did not occupy such a position. I think they have been stingy and insufficient, and I know, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that he did insist in the case of Alaska, as I recollect that he has in other cases insisted, upon larger and more liberal appropriations. I want Alaska to get the largest possible appropriation for education until her needs are fully met. But the point in my mind is, is this the best way to get a full and adequate appropriation for schools in Alaska? I ask the Senator from Colorado who can tell when this amendment passes how much Alaska is going to get and what use is going to be made of it for schools there? The appropriations have been for Indian education. There is a large and increasing number of white people.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator want me to answer the question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I can answer the question. There has been a census taken of Alaska, and it is fair to presume that nearly every person in Alaska who is not a white man is uneducated, for it is a generation since we bought that territory.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Mr. President, suppose the Senator is right now, and that he can take this bill as it is before us and after a little figuring tell us just how much money Alaska will get for education; what use is going to be made of it? What use are they making of it? He says they have no system of common schools for the whites. They have a system of Indian schools. This amendment provides that the appropriation here shall be expended in that way. Now, come to the matter of the grant. Suppose the Senator was able to tell me that under this bill Alaska will get $20,000. That is inadequate; and now we come to the education bill, which is to supplement that amount. Is it not certain that that amount will be charged up to Alaska, and that just that much less will be appropriated when we come to pass the appropriation bill?

So it has seemed to me that we were introducing here an element which those who are unfriendly to liberal appropriations for Alaska might use and say that you do not need $40,000 this year because you are provided for in the Blair bill, and therefore cut down the appropriation; and it has seemed to me that we should be more apt to get a liberal appropriation for Alaska if we asked it square and flat in the appropriation bill and there defined its use. If this will accomplish more, I am for it. It was only because that doubt was in my mind that I have said what I have.

Now, one word more——

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to make a suggestion. I agree with the Senator that this bill ought not to have Indian schools attached to it, because there is a separate provision for them; but I ask whether or not the amendment might not be so worded that it would apply to the same grade of schools in Alaska that are intended to be aided by the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Possibly it might.

Mr. LOGAN. That would avoid the difficulty, because it certainly ought not to apply to Indians.

Mr. HARRISON. That would separate the matter entirely and make this appropriation apply to such white schools as might be established there.

Mr. LOGAN. After they have a school system under the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Leaving the Indians to be otherwise provided for. It can not be, however, that they can have any school system until we give it to them, because they have no power to pass any legislation there; and I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that the framers and promoters of the bill providing for a civil government in Alaska did not claim that it was an accomplished, a complete, and an adequate system of government. It was quite impossible, aside from any consideration of economy, to give a full Territorial organization to Alaska. There were not sufficient white men there, and those that were there were scattered over 2,000 miles of coast. It would have been impossible to organize a Legislature in Alaska, and I believe it is still impossible. In view of that impossibility executive and judicial officers were provided for the Territory, and a code of laws already in force in the nearest State, namely, the State of Oregon, was put in force there. It was the best that could be done. It may be improved in some details now, but I reassert that the condition of that Territory is not such to-day as to justify a full Territorial organization, including a Territorial Legislature.

Now, what I want is to get the most money we can up to an adequate supply for education there. If this will accomplish it I make no objection. It seemed to me that it was complicating the appropriations in such a way that it would be used by those who might desire to make a small appropriation in the regular bill as a reason for cutting it down by calculations that were too liberal as to the amount that would be received under this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, when Alaska was received from the Russian Government there were a majority of the people in that territory, all those called Aleuts, living on the islands away from the mainland and far over toward the Asiatic coast, who were educated, who were Christianized, who had schools in every hamlet, and who lived as civilized people live in the United States, in houses with their proper furniture and proper conveniences. They had their school-houses; they had their churches; they all belonged to the Greek Church, and were under the care of the Russian Government and that Church for their civilization and their education. There was another class living along the coast and up in the edge of the mountains who were wild, unruly Indians, prone to drink, prone to robbery and theft. There were on two little islands in Behring Bay a population of Aleuts who carried on the fur-seal fisheries there, numbering some four or five or six hundred people, who live there to-day, and have for the last twenty years, under the control and carrying on the business of the Alaska Commercial Company, who lease these two little islands up in the mists and fogs of Behring Straits catching the fur-seals.

From the time these people became citizens or inhabitants of a Territory belonging to the United States, this Government never has until within the last two years made any effort whatever to continue the education of these Russian-Greeks, the Aleuts—never a dollar appropriated for their education or for any purpose connected with their religion, their civilization, their livelihood, their protection in any way.

We shall have received in the course of a year or two into the Treasury of the United States as much money as this Government gave for that whole Territory from two little obscure islands in Behring Bay, far north of where these Aleuts live. Three hundred and sixty thousand dollars a year for twenty years has been received in clean cash into the Treasury of the United States as a royalty upon the fur-seals and other furs caught in that region—paid into the Treasury of the United States with but a very trifling expenditure to keep our agents there to see to the delivery of the seals and their protection.

Now, sir, the generosity, the magnanimity of the United States in regard to those people is shown in the fact that some sixteen years ago when the fur-seal fisheries of these islands were offered for sale at public auction, the law provided that the company which got the islands, with a monopoly of the seal fisheries, should maintain schools on the islands for the Aleuts therein, and give them a common-school education. The Government did nothing; the United States contributed not a dollar to the education of any of the people of that Territory. The Government of the United States has received and will receive back into the Treasury at the expiration of the twenty years' lease the $7,000,000 which was paid for the whole territory of Alaska. We have made that country a source of revenue; we have subjected its products to royalties for the support of our Government; and out of the five or six million dollars that we have received from these two little islands in Alaska we never have contributed until two years ago one single cent for the education of the people of Alaska.

These Aleuts are not in any sense in which we speak of them in connection with education, Indians. They were originally Eskimos, coming from Russia, then becoming through generations a distinct people, civilized, Christianized, educated, living in houses, with their church in their midst and their schools with them. Of course when our Government received that territory from Russia by treaty we were obliged to take care of the welfare of its inhabitants. It was not deemed necessary to put into a treaty made with the great Republic of the United States, so religious, with its people so educated, with its loud boasts in favor of the general and universal education of its people, a requirement that the Government of the United States should give some means of continuing the education of those people which the Russian Government had provided for. These several thousand Aleuts live in hamlets scattered along these islands for 2,000 miles, stretching from the neighborhood of Sitka far out through eighteen or nineteen degrees of longitude almost over to the Asiatic coast. They have been left there to be educated by their own people in their own little hamlets, by their priests of the Greek Church as they were before. Now we are asked to extend to those people the common advantages for illiteracy that we do to the people of other portions of the United States.

Sir, if there is one dark stain overhanging the American Republic which the nations of the earth may look upon and taunt us with, it is that we received from a barbaric government—from what we sometimes call a half-civilized government—a portion of its territory, with people in it educated, quiet, civilized, living, sleeping, and eating in their own houses, with the furniture of reasonably good houses in their midst, living in hamlets of from fifty to five hundred inhabitants, with their own churches and their own school-houses; that we received that people from the Russian Government, and have never contributed one cent to their education or permitted them by any form of law to educate their own children. Sir, these Aleuts have not gone back into barbarism. These Aleuts have not forgotten the sign of the cross. These people have not forgotten to assemble themselves on the Lord's day to worship in their own form of worship the God that created them. They have not forgotten their own birthright, their own education, their own religion. They have not engaged in any act whatever unworthy of an educated Christian people.

There are thousands of them on the islands from Unalaska on toward the west, and they are living there supporting themselves by the fisheries and by fur-catching and by such means as they are able in that inhospitable clime to live by, and a large part of their earnings and a large part of what they may accumulate over and above the actual necessities of life they pay for their schools and for their churches for their mental and moral improvement to-day. That is the stain upon my nation, and that is the disgrace to our Republic; and if foreign nations understood and if the philanthropists of foreign nations knew how we oppressed these people they could array it against the Republic more strongly than any other matter that could excite prejudice against our Government and against our people.

Sir, what has become of the little appropriation which was made two years ago for that country, $25,000 for the Indians and fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to help along their schools? The money was there, but I say it with shame for my country, the men who were sent to take charge of its distribution, with the powers that were granted under the Territorial law or District law which we passed, if the reports are all true, joined with those who would encourage drunkenness all along the line of the shore Indians. They did not reach, thank God, the Aleuts, who live in a remote and a too inhospitable region to be brought under their influence. The very man to whom the money was given to expend among these people was four times imprisoned and once sent into a dungeon by the authorities of the United States. Sent there to promote government, sent there to promote order, sent there to enforce good laws, sent there to give their influence as representatives of our people in favor of temperance, of sobriety, of education, and I might almost add, except that it would be met with scorn, in favor of religion of some kind or other, the tone and feeling of some of the officers of the United States was more in favor of distilling what they call in that country koochinoo, a vile intoxicating drink, than it was in favor of good legislation or good order or government. The facts in regard to that matter shall one of these days come before the Senate. They have already come before the Executive of the country, and I am thankful for one to give all due praise for the fact that when the present Executive of the United States obtained information showing how some of the officers of that Territory, appointed under the Territorial laws, had dishonored their position and done the direct contrary of what the people of the United States desired them to do, he removed them and put other and we have some reason to hope better men in their places.

If there is a place on the earth beyond the bounds of civilization, removed from the influences which govern the good people of the United States in their homes, in their thoughts, in their education, and in their religion, it would seem that if we send agents there to make that benighted country a part of our own and like our own, to give it education, to give it intelligence, to give it good government, they join with the worst element that can be found on that coast and encourage the worst license and the worst dissipation. That has been characteristic of that region through the years that are past, and I speak of it now because I invoke beforehand what the world demands and what the good people of the United States demand, a strict investigation of the manner in which the officials of the United States now removed have carried the flag and borne the authority and wielded the sword and governed that people. It is a disgrace to the human race anywhere—among the Kaffirs of Africa or the Patagonians of the South, or wherever barbarity or cruelty or a reckless disregard of the advancing civilization of any people has come to our knowledge. I have some documents on that subject which are not appropriate to this occasion; I have some references to the needs and necessities of the people called Aleuts different from the other Indians of that country and as to the negligence with which they have been treated, which I shall take occasion on some proper opportunity to present to the Senate and invoke its consideration.

Now, sir, I desire to favor this amendment, either in the form it is now or in some other which shall during the recurring years in which this vast appropriation is to be expended for illiteracy among the people of the United States secure its application to Alaska. I do not care whether the people live in a State, or in a Territory, or in a District, or in whatever region it may be. Wherever the flag of my country floats over citizens and inhabitants of the country, there remains the same need for their intelligence and for their advancement and for their education. These people are citizens of a common country, perhaps against their will bought from the dominion of a Russian monarchy, or a Russian despotism, as we call it, to become inhabitants of the territory of the United States and citizens of this great Republic. Wherever they may be, wherever the flag floats, let it float over an educated people; give them the same advantages of and the same chance for education that you give to the frontiersman of the West, to the citizen of the South, to the illiterate of the North. God knows they need that help. Neglected as they have been, the wonder is that during these twenty years these educated and partially civilized and enlightened people have not gone back into vice, have not become savages, have not forgotten to dwell in houses, have not burned up their school-houses for fuel and torn down the cross from their church to mock it in public. The marvel is that the instincts of the people, or the religious convictions within them, have kept them free from vice comparatively, have kept them still civilized, have kept them still willing to contribute of their meager means in excess of their actual subsistence to educating their own children in the best way they can.

I have been told by those who have been there that a more humane, a more hospitable, a more genial, a more generous, a more neighbor-loving people do not exist, either among the heats of the tropics or the snows of the north, than this vast body of Aleuts, who stretch from Sitka far west for 2,000 miles to the Japan Gulf, the hot-water stream of the Pacific, which circles around and passes through their islands and gives them a climate of comparative mildness, but a sterile and non-producing region for grains and fruits.

Sir, if this amendment needs further amendment to make it accomplish the purpose, let it be so amended; but give to these several thousand Aleuts, these members of the Greek Church, these people who have their school-houses, these people who have their churches, these people who have their houses and furniture where they live—give them some little assistance while you are pouring out this $77,000,000 in more favored parts of the country; give them some little portion of this magnificent bequest. Do it to remove the stain from our own people; do it in fulfillment of the pledge, implied if not written, with which we received them at the hands of the Russian Government; do it in the name of their religion and ours, in the name of the American people, who desire to see every individual, high and low, poor and rich, Greek, Gentile, or Jew, brought within the benefits and the advantages of this system of education whose lack we so much deplore, and to restore which and to encourage which we are prepared to-day to give such a bountiful donation.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the population of Alaska is 23,426 by the last census, and less than 500 are whites. There is no enumeration of the population with reference to education or illiteracy, but, as the Senators have stated, it is fair to presume that the whole of them substantially are unable to write. At all events, they are all in need of common-school education. The amount that would fall under the apportionment of the bill to the inhabitants of that Territory, assuming them all to be illiterate, the first year would be $1,600 and a few dollars over, and when the largest amount comes to be appropriated in the year of the largest amount, $15,000,000 in all, the sum for Alaska would be, perhaps, $3,500; it would be small in any event. But it seems to me that as an act of recognition and confession of that justice which is due to these people it would be well to adopt the amendment. It can do no harm. It is a recognition that they are a portion of the American people and may furnish a precedent of great good in the future; and certainly the debate which has been evolved by this amendment is very instructive and must have some effect in the direction of more liberal appropriations hereafter. It will be expended, as the amendment provides, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and of course in his discretion it would be properly expended. There is no school system there, but he can make one. That is to say, there is none established by law; but education is going on there under the direction of Christian charity, and a little money poured into that general fund or expended separately under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior would do great good.

I hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it seems strange to me that when it is proposed to limit the approriations under this bill to the Southern States where the need of Federal aid to education is apparent, the friends of the bill object and say that it should be extended to all the States and Territories upon some basis, and when it is proposed to make certain that the far-distant Territory of Alaska, the Territory which most needs the bounty of the Government for educational purposes, is to be included within the provisions of the bill, the friends of the bill oppose such an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. What friends of the bill oppose the amendment?

Mr. DOLPH. I understand your colleague and the Senator from Indiana to oppose it.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator knows that when he first suggested it to me several days ago I assented to it as far as I am concerned as one friend of the bill. Certainly any other statement would be unjust to me.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not mean to say all the friends of the bill; I should perhaps say some friends of the bill oppose the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, the objections which have been made to this amendment, I think, are based upon want of information as to the facts in the case. As I said some days ago, there is no school system established by law in Alaska. The first appropriation that was ever expended for schools in that Territory was made by the bill creating a District government for Alaska, and the terms of the appropriation were as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Interior shall make needful and proper provision for the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, until such time as permanent provision shall be made for the same, and the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose.

And I believe also the appropriation of $15,000 made at the last session of Congress was in the same terms and could be applied by the Secretary of the Interior to the education of children of school age in the Territory irrespective of race; and the schools so established and maintained at the expense of the Government, with those which are maintained by private donations, are the only schools in the Territory, and the only schools there will be in the Territory probably for a generation. Whatever system of education there shall be hereafter established in the Territory will be established by a law of Congress or by the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of power conferred upon him by such a law. This amendment is simply intended to give the people of Alaska their proportion of the large amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the bill under consideration, and it is provided that it shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, not in his discretion, but virtually in accordance with whatever law Congress may enact upon the subject. Of course if Congress says it shall be expended in his discretion, then it will be so expended; but if Congress shall by law regulate the expenditure of the annual appropriations for educational purposes in the Territory, then whatever appropriations are made under this bill for education in Alaska will be expended in accordance with that law. It is provided that it shall be expended—

> In the manner provided for the expenditure of other appropriations for educational purposes in said District.

And then to meet the objection which has been made that there has been no census taken which shows the number of illiterates in the Territory, it is provided that—

> The Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein.

I do not agree with the Senators who have said that the money appropriated for education in Alaska has been either misapplied or has not produced good results. I undertake to say that there never has been money appropriated by the Federal Government or by a State for the education of whites or Indians in any part of the United States that has produced better results than the expenditure of the money appropriated by Congress for education in Alaska.

A few days since, in speaking on this question of education in Alaska, I made a letter from Rev. S. Hall Young a part of my remarks. In that letter he states the number of schools now in the Territory of Alaska as follows:

> There are at present in operation nine schools in the archipelago, classified as follows:
> (a) Mission day schools, three, namely: One at Chilcoot Harbor, in the extreme north of the archipelago, taught by Miss Bessie Matthews. The second is at Hoonah, on Cross Sound, and is taught by Rev. J. W. McFarland and his wife. The third is at Longass, in the extreme south of the archipelago, taught by two half-breeds trained at Fort Wrangel, Mr. Louis Paul and wife.
> The teachers of these schools are all paid directly by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, and are accountable only to it.
> (b) Government day schools, four:
> 1. At Sitka, Miss Powell, teacher.
> 2. At Juneau, Miss Murphy, teacher.
> 3. At Fort Wrangel, Miss McAvoy, teacher.
> 4. At Jackson, Miss Gould, teacher.
> These schools are supported entirely by the Government, and are under the supervision of Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D. D., agent of education. They were formerly mission schools, but have been handed over to the Government.
> (c) Boarding schools, two:
> 1. The Sitka training school, in charge of Professor A. J. Davis, with eight assistants. This school is supported jointly by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions and the Government.
> 2. The Thinkit training academy, at Fort Wrangel, in charge of Mrs. S. H. Young and three assistants. This institution is supported entirely by private contributions and is under no society or board.

As I said on a former occasion, the natives of Alaska can never be placed upon reservations and put under Government surveillance. They are at present self-supporting, and there is no reason why they should not always remain so. In order that they may remain self-supporting they must always be treated in respect to their occupations the same as the white inhabitants of the Territory, and in any educational system which we may establish for that Territory schools must be common to all the citizens of the United States and to all the uncivilized tribes. I think the Aleuts, who have been referred to by the Senator from Michigan, are already entitled to citizenship under the provisions of the treaty of cession of March, 1867, article 3 of which provides:

> The inhabitants of the ceded Territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years; but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Mr. Young in his letter to me, to which I have referred, says in regard to this:

> 1. The number of natives in Alaska is computed at 30,000, and of these more than half are called Indians, although their appearance, customs, mode of life, dispositions, and degree of advancement in mechanical arts prove them to be of different race from the Indians of the plains, and point to a comparatively recent Asiatic origin. The term Indian applied to our natives here is misleading.

Then what is the situation? All the schools we have in Alaska today are supported by the General Government, and in the nature of things they must be for a long period. The native population, whether they are Indians or not, civilized or uncivilized, are largely in the majority and will be for many years. They are self-supporting, and, as I have said before, whatever provision is made for their education ought to be a common provision made for all the children of school age in the Territory, the same as we have so far made provision for education in Alaska. There being no Territorial school system, there being no way in which a discrimination can be made between white children and native children under the law, and as the money appropriated is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, there are no two systems in the Territory, as was suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. There is but one system, the system which we have established or a system to be established for the present under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, a system to be maintained by appropriations made by Congress; and there is no reason that I can see why the people of Alaska should not share in the bounty of the Government under this bill. There are no obstacles in the way.

Now, in regard to Indian education in the States and organized Territories, there is a difficulty in the way of extending the provisions of this act to Indian schools, because the State school systems and Territorial systems in the organized Territories do not embrace Indian education; that is being carried on entirely at the expense of the Federal Government, while the education of the white children in the States and Territories is being carried on by the States and Territories; but, as I said before, that objection does not obtain in the case of Alaska, and there is no reason why the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I rise to make a correction.

Mr. DOLPH. Permit me one word more. I think the Senator from New Hampshire was mistaken about the amount.

Mr. BLAIR. I was about to make a correction.

Mr. DOLPH. I will wait to hear the explanation.

Mr. BLAIR. I compared in my mind at first the whole populations, treating the entire population of Alaska as compared to the entire population of the country, which gave the result I stated when I was on the floor before; but it should be compared, if they are to be considered as illiterates, with the illiterate population of the country, which is 6,239,000. Treating the entire population of Alaska as illiterate, the result would be to give to Alaska some $27,000 under the first distribution and twice that amount when the highest apportionment shall be made under the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Twenty-seven thousand dollars the first year?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, the first year. But there never has been any appropriation at all adequate to the necessities of Alaska, and if the Committee on Appropriations, notwithstanding what the Territory gets under this bill, should give as much in their bill, still there would be a call for more.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, when the education bill was under consideration in the last Congress I availed myself of the courtesy of the Senate to discuss fully the constitutional questions and principles involved. I desire now to make no argument, but a brief statement.

While it has been demonstrated that Congress does possess the power under the Constitution to make a grant of the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands or the public lands themselves, however acquired, whether by cession from the States or by conquest or by treaty or by purchase with money raised by taxation, and may likewise make a grant of the public moneys from the Treasury, however derived, being alike the common resources of the people, to aid common-school education by the States, I must confess it is a power like that to declare war—so liable to abuse. I would not resort to it with the purpose to establish an undeviating and unlimited policy, and would exercise it only under the stress and pressure of the most urgent, exceptional, and extraordinary circumstances.

The justification for its exertion at this time grows out of the most calamitous and stupendous transaction in this century—a war between the enlightened and powerful Commonwealths of the American Union, lasting, it is true, only four years, yet marked by sacrifices of property and life and by battles and campaigns and followed by political and social revolutions without a parallel in the history of civilized man.

The North, that emerged triumphant from the conflict, is not in all respects the North that entered it, for material changes have taken place in the vital conditions of society, resulting in the gradual disappearance of the old simple ways of living, in the creation of a class on the one hand who possess more concentrated wealth and power than any order of nobility in any nation of Europe, exercising a more extensive authority over the occupations of the people than the Federal Government itself, and on the other hand another class dependent upon their daily labor for their daily bread and separated from the former by a deep and widening chasm.

I do not mean to exaggerate the evils of this disproportional distribution of wealth or the manifest growth of discontent and tendencies toward communism, but however much they may be mitigated and modified by wise legislation and practical benevolence, it must be admitted that the self-restraint and composure and disposition to settle all questions upon the basis of justice which will enable the law-making power to meet and master the new social problems and embarrassments aggravated by immigration, and to determine ultimately what shall be the relations of the individual to the State and the limitations upon corporations, are to be found and found only in the discipline and resources of education upon a scale and to an extent not yet generally adopted.

The people will be enabled to control and govern themselves with universal suffrage by means of universal education, or sooner or later they will be governed, as in all the most powerful nations of Europe, by permanent class distinctions with special privileges backed by standing armies. Our own country is the only exception to this rule among great and rich nations. Let us invoke every influence and agency before the population becomes too dense and unwieldy in favor of popular right and education as the surest safeguards of republican government. Better an intelligent ballot than the bayonet; better co-operation and a good understanding than measures of repression.

The South of to-day is not in all respects the South as she stood before the world twenty-five years ago. Never was the discomfiture and ruin of a country more complete. The exhaustion of Prussia under Frederick or of France under Napoleon was not more thorough. All the accumulations of many generations had been devoured. But succeeding her military overthrow, she witnessed all her local institutions—industrial, financial, educational, and religious—all the organized forces of society shattered and pulverized; the very foundations on which they had stood firmly since the settlement of the country torn up and destroyed—a complete bouleversement—and her political rehabilitation committed chiefly to her former negro slaves, suddenly elevated not only to be freemen, but enfranchised and intrusted with political control. Accepting the situation as it existed, she put forth every exertion, every circumspection, every resource of patience and wisdom and courage to meet these new conditions, to reconcile herself to them as she could, and to find some firm common ground on which all her people might move forward again in harmonious relations and peaceful order to the enjoyment of self-government and the pursuit of happiness.

The magnitude and difficulty of the task can only be appreciated by those upon whom it was imposed and by those noble-hearted men of the North who, having surveyed the whole field, came forward with generous sympathy and abundant means to aid and assist in the great work of moral and educational advancement. It may be, it doubtless will be, that from the ruins of the old order stronger and happier commonwealths shall arise, as fields on which crops of rich clover pass under the plowshare, though temporarily wasted, become with returning seasons more fertile and productive.

But it must be plain without argument that the one indispensable condition of prosperity, nay, of peace and security and well-being in these communities, the guarantees for life and property since the establishment of universal suffrage, are to be supplied by universal education, and that the burdens upon the property-holders to carry forward this necessary work under these circumstances are altogether out of proportion to their resources.

While these manifest perils and drawbacks to our free institutions exist in the North as well as in the South, they are to be found in a larger measure in the section which was more affected by the passions and changes of the civil war, and which it must be admitted does not receive so large a portion of the expenditures of the Federal Government in pensions and for the public debt and the support of the Army and Navy and the protection of manufacturing industries and shipping interests, while contributing a full proportionate share of the Federal taxation.

Such legislation can be justified only, I repeat, as a temporary expedient to meet a great public exigency and necessity, and must be regarded not as daily bread, but as a medicine for grave national disorders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 1, to strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 1 of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of $17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000, ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this proposition at any length, but to call the attention of the Senate to this amendment and to the remarks of the Senator having this bill in charge. In the course of his remarks yesterday that Senator said:

The amount appropriated by the bill is not likely to be sufficient for the removal of this evil, but it will open the way to a more just appreciation of its magnitude and to a more enlarged and statesmanlike action in the future.

This shows that the Senator from New Hampshire does not regard this bill as it stands as sufficient to accomplish the end in view. I have always entertained the opinion myself, and do now, that a bill must not necessarily pass exactly as it is reported from a committee, and I hope Senators will not think that every one who proposes an amendment is trying to destroy the bill.

I offer this amendment because I think it is right, and because I do not believe that the amount appropriated by the bill of $7,000,000 the first year is going to do any good so far as the illiteracy of the children of this country is concerned. As I said yesterday, take my own State; the appropriation for school purposes alone last year in Illinois was about $9,000,000, and now you take all the States of the Union and appropriate $7,000,000 to assist in educating the illiterate children of this country. If you take the South alone, and expend the whole $7,000,000 there the first year it would amount to very little. If we intend to educate or assist in educating those children, why not have nerve enough as men to vote an amount that will do them some good? Had we not as well say to our constituents that this $7,000,000 appropriated now is only an entering-wedge? Do you tell me that $100,000,000 is going to educate or assist in educating these people in accordance with this bill? Why, Mr. President, if I should be asked to-day my opinion as to how much money will be appropriated following this appropriation before we cease appropriating for the purpose, if there is any success attained at all, I should say that $250,000,000 will be appropriated before we stop, and I should not be surprised if much more was appropriated. Then why not take hold of this thing in a statesmanlike manner and appropriate sufficient money, if we intend to benefit these people and do them some good?

By my amendment the appropriation (and I am willing to risk my reputation among my constitutents upon what I say on this subject) will amount to $136,000,000 in ten years. Your bill appropriates $77,000,000 in eight years. The school age under this bill is from ten years up to twenty-one. This includes ten years, giving a chance for education to those from ten years old up to twenty, and appropriates what I think will be a sufficient sum to do some good to these people, white or black or whoever they may be.

I make these remarks in good faith, wanting this amendment adopted and the bill passed; and I shall ask for a vote on the amendment at this time unless somebody wishes to discuss it.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the aggregate amount?

Mr. LOGAN. One hundred and thirty-six million dollars in ten years. I said yesterday $138,000,000, but I was mistaken. I have figured it up this morning and I find it is $136,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, so that it may be understood, to offer this as a substitute for all the lines of the first section, including the amounts appropriated; but the last five lines, providing for the distribution of the money, are not intended to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proviso is to remain in the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. My motion is only to substitute this amendment in lieu of the appropriations proposed in the first section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the first section down to and including the word "dollars," in line 11, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of $17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000, ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease.

So that the section when amended will read:

That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of $17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000, ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease, which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States: Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act; and such acceptahce shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I stand by all I said yesterday, and if there were time or occasion for it I would intensify what I said yesterday as to the extent of this evil and what I believe to be the real inadequacy of the provisions of the bill as they stand for its removal, and also by all that I said in reference to the Senator's appreciation of this evil and that he more than any other public man has made proposals calculated for its removal. The difficulty is in the general apprehension of the condition of the public mind and of other Senators who do not quite concur in the views of the Senator and myself, and it has been thought more judicious to begin with a smaller appropriation and try and see how it works. I believe the result will be that further investigation, further light, will lead to an appropriation such as the Senator calls for and perhaps even larger, not permanent, but for the emergency; and the time will come when the American people will be thankful that the Senator has made these suggestions, even if they should not be accepted.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition; and inasmuch as a great many Senators are absent, I think it would be well to have the record made plain.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator the aggregate of the sum?

Mr. LOGAN. The proposition that I make in this amendment will in ten years appropriate $136,000,000. Then I intend to offer an amendment proposing $2,000,000 for school-houses, making the whole appropriation $138,000,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And the original bill I understand to be $77,000,000. I am surprised that the mover of the bill does not accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). As I have already stated to-day, I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is absent on account of family affliction. If he were here, judging from his course, I have no doubt he would vote against this amendment. If he were here, I should vote for it.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired on all matters pertaining to this bill with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], but I understand he and I are in accord on this question, and therefore I vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay," if at liberty. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. I should have stated while the roll was being called, as I have no doubt the Senator from New Jersey stated before, that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is detained by sickness to-day, and is paired on this bill with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. COKE. I was mistaken in supposing that I was paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], but I am not at liberty to vote, being paired with some gentleman on the other side, who told me he would be absent for an hour or two. I do not see him here, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HAMPTON. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER], who was called off on business, is on general questions paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I am paired with him on the final passage of the bill, but on amendments I have considered myself free to vote.

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I do not vote.

Mr. INGALLS. I repeat the announcement that my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Call,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Ransom,
Cullom,	Eustis,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Walthall.

NAYS—30.

Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Conger,	McPherson,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I will proceed a little further and offer another amendment, and see if our educational friends really mean what they say, inasmuch as they do not consider me very sound on this bill. I offer this amendment to follow the first section:

SEC. —. That there shall be appropriated and set apart, in addition to the sum of $7,000,000 for the first appropriation, the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year, which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof, where the local community shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior, as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator under whose supervision this money is to be expended for school-houses?

Mr. LOGAN. Under the same supervision as the money appropriated in the bill for school purposes is to be expended.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I notice the expression in the amendment "where the local community shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation." Who is to determine the question of the comparative wealth or poverty of a community?

Mr. LOGAN. That is the simplest proposition in the world. The tax-list will always develop that fact to the school superintendent or the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else who may have charge of it. There is no difficulty whatever about that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But it is comparative—compared with what?

Mr. LOGAN. Compared with those who are able to build their own school-houses. I am willing the Senator shall suggest any better language and will readily accept it, but I do not know any better language to use myself. When we use the term "comparatively" in reference to any proposition it seems to me we certainly understand what it means.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There might be a comparison between the State of Georgia and another State; or you might take a district in Georgia and compare it with a district in Massachusetts. We might take another line. Who is to determine whether you take one State and compare it with another State, or whether you take a district of one State and compare it with another district of the same State? In one State they might be all comparatively poor as compared with another State. Therefore it seems rather an indefinite term unless there is something more in the act clearly defining what is meant by it.

Mr. LOGAN. I can only illustrate it by speaking of my own State. We build our school-houses in our school districts, and our school districts tax themselves for that purpose. I suppose that in any of these States where they have a common-school system, where there is not a sufficient number of school-houses to accommodate all the children of school age, the authorities in distributing the school fund under their own laws and in distributing the school fund under this bill would certainly take it upon themselves to decide where there was such poverty as that the people needed assistance in erecting school-houses. If we are willing to risk the distribution of $7,000,000 the first year in the hands of the States, we ought certainly to be willing to risk this $2,000,000 for the purpose of building school-houses in their limits.

The bill, as the Senate well knows, is not exactly in accordance with my notions; but at the same time this distribution is to be made on the same plan as that in the bill for the distribution of the other fund.

Mr. BLAIR. I am personally very anxious that the amendment shall be adopted, because a school-house is as important as a teacher, and in those sparsely settled districts where the funds of the people are not such as that they can well afford the burden of erecting a school-house and providing a suitable building it will be almost impossible to establish a school for a very considerable time unless there be assistance; and as there are extensive tracts of country where school-houses must be erected to make the opportunity for the suitable use of these moneys, it seems to me that we ought not only to provide something in the way of furnishing the school-house, but also make provision that a correct model be used, so that in all the country round about, in all the school-houses which may be built with the local funds, the whole section of country where school-houses are not now abounding shall be supplied with those in reference to sanitary conditions and conveniences to the scholar and to the teacher, and a proper location and every other consideration that can be suggested; and thus from the mere fact of imitation it would soon come to be the case that those portions of our country which now have no school-houses at all would be supplied with the very best that could be found. The amendment is very careful in its provisions, that the school-houses shall be erected in accordance with models which shall be provided free of expense by the Bureau of Education; that is a plan not costly; but they shall be in every respect suitable to the most enlightened and advanced requirements of educators in this regard.

The amount is small. It can not be claimed that it is an effort to construct the school-houses of any portion of the country, because the amendment provides that only one-half the cost of the school-house shall be paid in any case whatever, and in no case shall more than $100 be paid out of this fund. Only $2,000,000 is proposed to cover the whole expense. I hope that the amendment will pass. I think it of the very greatest consequence. I remember the time when in New England the school-houses were almost like the structures of the Dark Ages. And where we have to supply a great extent of country necessarily as the result of this appropriation, we should supply a fund for school-houses and see that they are of the best models.

Mr. HAMPTON. I did not catch the language of the first part of the amendment. I should like to know whether the appropriation of $2,000,000 is to be an annual one or whether it is a sum in gross.

Mr. BLAIR. It is the whole fund to be expended for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That part of the amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be appropriated and set apart, in addition to the sum of $7,000,000 for the first appropriation, the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not appear in the printed amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not the amendment as it was printed.

Mr. LOGAN. No; it is the amendment as I offered it. I inserted the words "in addition to the sum of $7,000,000 of the first appropriation," because I do not want to interfere with the school fund proper in the first year's distribution.

Mr. BLAIR. This is to be in addition to the first appropriation of $7,000,000?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. And you do not contemplate any subsequent appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HAMPTON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the sum should be rather larger than $100 for a school-house. A hundred dollars would scarcely be sufficient to put up a decent school-house. I throw out the suggestion for his consideration. I think if he would enlarge the sum to $150 or $200 it would be better than as the amendment now stands.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator that this is intended for the poor people in districts where they are not able to build school-houses. Two hundred dollars will build a school-house that will be a very good one for children. The first part of what little education I had was received in a school-house that did not cost nearly so much as that, and I learned just as well as if it had been a better one. Of course this does not apply to cities or towns where fine school-houses are built, but to sparsely settled neighborhoods, where the people are poor; and in such neighborhoods you will find that a school-house costing $200, where the money is properly expended, will be a very convenient and commodious house, and one in my judgment that will be perfectly comfortable for a common school in any part of the country. Of course nowadays we have school-houses that cost from $1,000 to $50,000. Some of them in my State for the higher graded schools cost enormous sums, too much, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. INGALLS. As the amendment does not correspond in print with that read at the desk, I ask that the first five lines may be repeated by the Chief Clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first part of the amendment will be read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be appropriated and set apart, in addition to the sum of $7,000,000 of the first appropriation, the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. There is an inconsistency apparent there from the reading. The amendment provides that this appropriation is to be in addition to the first payment of $7,000,000, and then that is to be paid out annually. That is the language. Then there must be a mistake in calling this "the common-school fund," because the entire fund is the common-school fund. I assume that it must have been intended for something else, perhaps for the school-house fund.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that it was intended for exactly what it says. It is all a school fund, although you divert a portion of it for the purpose of building school-houses. It is all the same fund, except that you use one part for educational purposes and the other for building school-houses. Still I am not particular about the language. I am perfectly willing to modify the amendment in that respect.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it be called the "school-house fund."

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I am willing to say that.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 13 of the original bill was exactly in the language of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. That section was stricken out by a vote of the Senate; and in that this fund was described, at the top of page 8, in line 5, section 13, in the original print, as the "school-house fund." So I assume there must have been a mistake.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken. The section was stricken out in the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. It does not appear in the subsequent print of the bill, so it must have been stricken out by the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator that the amendment I present now I offered to the bill when it was pending in the last Congress, and in the draught of the original bill, which was referred to the committee at the present session, this amendment was inserted as a section.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. LOGAN. The Committee on Education and Labor, and the committee struck it out.

Mr. INGALLS. It has not been stricken out by the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it is in the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it is not in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears in the first print, Calendar No. 15, Senate bill 194, report No. 4, section 13, in exactly the same language as the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. It appears with lines drawn through it.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it could not have been stricken out of the bill unless the Senate agreed to strike it out. The Committee on Education and Labor could not strike it out; they could only report a recommendation that it should be stricken out.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not saying what they could do or what they could not do; I am only speaking of what they did do. I am not discussing as to the proprieties or improprieties or powers; I am only stating the facts. They did strike it out, that is all, and the bill was reprinted with that section out, as it had been reported to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will examine the new print put on our tables this morning, he will see that the sections run to section 12 and then skip to section 14, showing that there has been something omitted.

Mr. LOGAN. I can not tell anything about that. It is not in the bill I have before me, and it is not in the bill we have been voting on as read by the clerks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair one moment, he will state that it appears from the bill that the committee reported to strike out section 13, and that the motion to strike out was sustained in the Senate, so that the original section 13 is not now a part of the bill at all.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 5 of my amendment, after the word "school," I move to insert the word "house;" so as to read, "common-school house fund."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so; and in line 5 I will strike out the word "annually;" so as to read:

To be paid out to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year.

Some Senators who are very much interested in the passage of the bill have suggested to me to change the wording so that it will read, beginning in line 12:

Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with plans to be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education in Washington.

So I strike out the words, in line 13, "modern plans which," and after the word "plans" I strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "to;" so that it will read as I have modified it:

SEC. —. That there shall be appropriated and set apart, in addition to the sum of $7,000,000 of the first appropriation, the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school house fund, to be paid out to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year, which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof, where the local community shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with plans to be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education at Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior, as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as modified.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that the bill, as it has been amended by the Senate, includes no provision for the construction of school-houses?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it does not include any such provision.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill provides that no part of the fund shall be used for school-house purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. It provides that the money shall not be used for school-houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Section 13 was stricken out several days ago.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I fail to see how the Senator from New Hampshire can justify the bill with that section stricken out.

Mr. BLAIR. We want to vote it in.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But I understand that it has been voted out.

Mr. BLAIR. No, no.

Mr. INGALLS. It certainly has been voted out.

Mr. BLAIR. Not as the Senator from Illinois has offered it. I will state just the way this whole matter stands. This amendment was moved by the honorable Senator from Illinois in the last Congress the night that the bill passed the Senate. It was strongly sustained, but it was imperfectly understood, very slightly discussed, and it failed. It seemed to some members of the committee at least that it was a valuable feature and that it ought to be added to the bill. So when the bill was introduced in this Congress it was inserted as section 13. The bill went to the Committee on Education and Labor, and one or two members of the committee objected to it and thought that we had better stand on the bill just as the Senate passed it. Their objection was not to the merits of the amendment so much as in deference to the idea that the Senate had once acted on the bill and we had better report it just as the Senate had agreed to it in the last Congress. Accordingly we reported the bill back with an amendment striking out that section, and so the bill came to the Senate with that section stricken out; and in the original print it was just as the Senator from Kansas recollects it to be.

Mr. INGALLS. And the Senate agreed to the amendment of the committee and struck out the section.

Mr. BLAIR. I was going to say that the Senator from Illinois desired to oppose that amendment and to retain the section in the bill, but the matter came up when hardly any one was present, and before I myself was aware of it action had been taken on the amendment. The Senator from Illinois was out of the Chamber.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not in at the time.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Illinois came back, and with considerable surprise found what had been the action of the Senate, and he in the first instance moved the section as an amendment. The bill being still in Committee of the Whole the amendment is technically objectionable, but he has now modified the amendment so that it is not exactly the same provision. Though it is very much like it, still it is not the section that was reported back to be stricken out by the committee. While in substance it is very much the same it is not the same, and is now an amendment strictly in order.

Mr. LOGAN. At the suggestion of some friends of the bill who know more about building school-houses than I do, because I am told they have had some experience in building them for this class of people, it has been thought best that I increase the amount from $100 to $150, which I propose to do, so that the first part of the proviso will read:

That not more than $150 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case.

With those changes I offer the amendment as a new section to the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I understand as the bill stands now there is no provision for the construction of school-houses.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state to the Senator how that is and how the discussion was in the Senate at the last Congress. The subject has not been up before, that I am aware of, during this debate. It was thought that the States ought to furnish the school-houses, and they are in substance required to do it; but there are a great many reasons why the States should be assisted so far as the amendment will assist them in securing in the sparsely settled and poorer portions of the country some aid from the General Government. The amount is small, and school-houses in the sparsely settled districts, according to the statements of the superintendents of education, never cost over $300. It is a very good school-house that costs $300 in money. To avoid excusing the people from effort on their own part, the amendment provides that not more than one-half of the cost of a school-house shall be paid from this fund. The people will be obliged always to pay the other half, and if they get $150, as the Senator from Illinois has now modified his amendment, out of this school-house fund, they must build a school-house which costs at least $300. If their school-house costs only $200, then by the amendment, they not taking over one-half the cost of any school-house, they must be content with $100. If the school-house costs $100 then they get only $50, and in no case will they get the full expense of the school-house nor more than one-half of it. If the school-house costs $600, they will have to pay it all except $150 by the limitation of the amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will ask the Senator further, unless there be some provision for the construction of school-houses does he really think that this beneficence will reach the object sought?

Mr. BLAIR. I will tell the Senator about that. Every particle of this money that we are giving can be used in existing school-houses for the prolongation of existing schools, and it would not then carry them more than five months, certainly not over six at the outside; but of course the money is to be used in such a way as to gradually disseminate the blessings of the system to those who do not enjoy it. It is to go into some unexplored country of ignorance, and there the people must have a school-house as well as a teacher; and it would seem to be very proper that we should do something toward the erection of school-houses for the accommodation of those who now have none. Does the Senator understand me?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understand the Senator's proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. By so far as we distribute this money where there are no schools at all we lessen the length that might otherwise be given to existing schools, but of course in an equalization of school privileges we must do something to reach those who have now no school-houses.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I fail to see how this bill can reach the benighted section which it is intended to reach unless there be provision made to construct school-houses. You can reach the large cities, that are provided for already in a measure, where school-houses have been constructed. The most populous and the most wealthy will be reached by the bill, but the comparatively poor spoken of here, those comparatively unable to bear the burden of taxation, are not reached and can not be reached by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. This amendment will supply them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But I understood that this amendment was stricken from the bill by the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator's object is in some way to cast a reflection upon the committee, he is welcome to take advantage of it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In the last Congress, when the bill passed the Senate, what provision was made then for school-houses?

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator's memory were as long as his disposition to find fault, he would recollect that this proposition was discussed very thoroughly, and that by the action of the Senate this matter was stricken out. Some who thought it would be a good idea to have school-houses provided for to some extent had brought forward this amendment, but it was not quite strong enough to be incorporated in the bill. However, it has come to the surface again, and I trust the Senator, in accordance with his suggestions, will try to improve the bill by helping to put this amendment into it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not know that I have obtained a definite answer to my question; but I suppose I may state it as a fact that during the last Congress when this bill left the Senate it had no provision in it for the construction of school-houses. Am I right? Then it seems strange that the committee should be willing that the bill should pass the Senate and be taken to the other House when there had been eliminated from it the only clause which could reach the object to be sought. Here was $77,000,000 to be paid to the wealthy, to be paid to the districts that could bear their burdens of taxation; and so it stands to-day. Is that all? Is this donation to reach no further than that? Is it not to reach the districts which are comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation?

If you pass the bill appropriating the $77,000,000 with no provision in it for school-houses, those who are so situated as to be without school-houses can not receive the benefit of this $77,000,000. They will not receive their distributive share until they build the school-houses; and who are to build the school-houses? The Senator says the States, and yet the States for these many years have not built school-houses in those districts. What assurance, what guarantee have you that the States will be more liberal in the construction of school-houses hereafter than they have been in the past? You tender this magnificent bounty of $77,000,000 to them when you know it can not reach the object you seek—the poor, the impoverished, those unable to bear the burden of taxation. You deny it to them. You provide carefully that there shall be teachers educated, and yet you make no provision for school-houses. Will my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] tell me that he thinks the colored men in the South will be able to construct school-houses from their own means in those districts where they have them not to-day? Does he suppose they will do it?

Mr. HOAR. I am in favor of this amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But it seems the bill passed the Senate in the last Congress without this amendment, and had the other House agreed to the measure you would then have thrown $77,000,000 into the pockets of the wealthy, according to your own bill.

Mr. HOAR. As the Senator seems to be in doubt, I will say that I voted for the amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. What I desire to know is why this bill, appropriating these millions, should have passed the hands of the Senate without a warning. The Senate had the power, and yet when they gave this $77,000,000 they shut the doors to its benefits to the class they said they wanted to reach. They denied it to them. You deny it to the colored men for whom you have pleaded, and to their children. You have denied it to the stolid ignorance of the Southern States, which you make the basis for this expenditure of millions. You strike out from this bill the only clause which can open the school-house to them. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] shakes his head. I say that you close the door to the objects that you seek to reach in the title of the bill by its pretended appropriation, and that is the attitude to-day.

Some one says go to the store! What do they generally sell to the colored man in the store in such a locality? Molasses and whisky. Go to the store! Would you send the ignorant colored boy to school at the store? I am surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts should be content to have the colored boy for whom he pleaded go to school at the store.

The cause for this project can very easily be penetrated. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] pleaded that he wanted universal education to protect universal suffrage. The Senator from Louisiana thought that this was the only thing that could reach and solve the difficult problem. He asks now universal education in behalf of universal suffrage, and I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire will respond amen, and the Senator from Massachusetts will make a loud amen also. Universal education to secure universal suffrage! We believe that; we have taught that; and yet you deny universal suffrage in this very bill; you have guarded it so that universal suffrage can not be secured and will not be secured in your States. You prevent the expenditure of a small sum to construct school-houses, the only mode by which the school-teacher can reach the ignorant child of the South. You provide for education in normal schools in your large cities, where teachers shall be educated to do what? To teach the children in the wealthy districts; and where the people are comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation you make them heavier, you do not unloose the burden there. Why not? Let gentlemen answer who think this bill is to be the open sesame to all the virtues of universal suffrage.

The Senator from Louisiana advocates this bill (otherwise I should have made no allusion to it, and it is a very proper inquiry) upon the liberal ground of securing universal suffrage. Why, is not universal suffrage secured already in the States of the Union? The Senator from Massachusetts has repeatedly said on this floor that universal suffrage is a mockery in some of the States of this Union; that they have it not. He insists that it was given to all men without regard to color, not only by law but by the most sacred of all instruments, the Constitution of the United States, given as a right; and yet that same Senator has said that this right has not been secured in many States of this Union.

I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has come to the relief of the Senator from Massachusetts and given him some assurance that universal suffrage can only be secured by universal education.

If that be so, if the Senators having the power to carry this bill through the Senate take that view, why is it, and the nation asks why is it, that this important feature has been eliminated from it? Does not the Senator from New Hampshire know, do not the statistics tell him, not only the proportion of the area of the South, but the proportion of its population who are to-day denied the privileges of common-school education in that section because of their inability or unwillingness to construct school-houses in which they can be taught? Yet the bill leaves it precisely there to-day.

I might properly suggest to the Senator from Louisiana, because it is undoubtedly true, that the vote of the colored men in the South is obnoxious to the white population of those States. It is unpleasant and disagreeable and nauseating for the white man of the South to go side by side with the colored man and deposit his vote in the ballot-box. I take it that that position can not be doubted. Will it be any more acceptable to your white people that the colored man who elbows his way up to the ballot-box can read and write or that he can solve a problem in arithmetic or answer questions in philosophy? Will they be disposed to recognize more willingly the right of the ballot secured by the laws and the Constitution of this country? Will it render the exercise of that right any more agreeable to the men of the South if the negro should be elevated a little above his present condition of ignorance and should know all the rudiments of an English education? If the bill passes as it is now there is no necessity to propound that question. In regard to probably one-half the area of the States you seek to benefit, in regard to one-half and more of the population of the States you seek to benefit, you have denied and taken from the people the privileges of this bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I interrupt the Senator for one moment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not like to say anything personal, but I think I am not obnoxious to the charge that he has made, for I can claim that I was the first man in the South after the war, and I believe the first man in America, to propose to give the negroes the right to vote; and I did that immediately after the war.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am proud to know that the fact is as stated by the gentleman from South Carolina; but did the white men of South Carolina cheerfully follow your example in that direction? Did the white men of Mississippi cheerfully follow you in that direction? There was the misfortune. Here and there there may have been a Moses to lead, but the followers were rebellious as of old.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. The modesty of the Senator from South Carolina doubtless keeps him silent in response to that challenge, but I should like to remind the Senator from Nebraska that the people of South Carolina so followed the advice of their distinguished Senator that they made him governor of the State in a way that stuck even in 1876.

Mr. HAMPTON. The negroes made me governor

Mr. VOORHEES. And the negroes made him governor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have no doubt of that. I am proud to know the fact that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina was bold enough and brave enough and good enough to stand out in advance and throw forth that flag the principles of which were implanted in the Constitution of this country. I am proud to know it, and proud to know that the colored people of the South, appreciating that goodness and that greatness and that boldness, placed him in the executive chair of South Carolina to rule over the destinies of the State. I have no doubt if my friend the Senator from Massachusetts were here to take part in this transient discussion, he would only regret that the other Senator from South Carolina and that the other States did not follow the distinguished example set them by the Senator from South Carolina.

This is no part of the argument I am making, because Senators know it is not my wont to allude to these things, and I speak it in no unkindness; I know they will believe me when I say I do not; but I was pointing the argument which I have often heard on this side of the Chamber. I have heard the men of the South arraigned, I have heard Mississippi arraigned by those men who are the special advocates of this bill. They have taunted you now and then with this matter. I am not here to do that. I only allude to the fact that some Senators, notably the Senator from Massachusetts, who is one of the prominent defenders of this bill, have done that thing. He has made the charge which I am only repeating as his, if he will allow me to do so, not as my own. I desire to show him that in passing this bill, taking $77,000,000 out of the Treasury, the object accomplished will not come anywhere near the object he is seeking to gain by it. If we are to accept this $77,000,000 of United States money, then the first thing to do is to construct a school-house, put there a teacher, and open the doors, or otherwise the ignorance to which my friend refers will be nearly as great at the expiration of the eight years as it is to-day, and those whom he seeks to benefit will not be benefited by this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say only that I hope this amendment will be adopted. It will enable the people in sparsely settled districts of the South to have schools. I have been in favor of the amendment all the time. I was in favor also of the other amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois granting $136,000,000 for common schools in the South and in the country at large. I voted against it, however, because I did not believe that it would help to pass the bill.

As a member of the Committee on Education and Labor two years ago I concurred in reporting a bill by which $105,000,000 was to be distributed according to the basis mentioned in this bill. That was the unanimous report of the committee. The bill came to the Senate with a proposition to give $105,000,000, but after debate here that amount was cut down to $77,000,000, the amount proposed in this bill. I believed then and I believe now that a bill granting $77,000,000 can pass Congress. I am afraid that a bill granting a larger sum would not pass Congress; and it is for that reason that I opposed the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to ask my friend from Mississippi a question, as I have great respect for any opinion he may have connected with this measure. This appropriation is made in aid of the States in the establishment of common schools. There must be common schools in existence in the States, established by the States. There can not be common schools without houses in which to teach the children. There may not be houses enough in certain localities; they may not be such houses as the people would desire; they might want them improved, they might want better houses; but this appropriation is proposed to be made to supply necessarily a local want. If houses are needed they will only be needed in certain parts of certain States. It is to relieve a local want, not a general want. The want for these houses can not be general, because in one-half or two-thirds of every State there are houses sufficient, and they are sufficiently comfortable to answer all the uses. Now, how can we appropriate $2,000,000 out of the Treasury to answer a want that is necessarily local in every State? That is my trouble. I am a friend of the bill; I should like to see these houses built; but I do not desire to load the bill down with these troubles; and my opinion is that the States do not need it; that it is not a want so pressing as to require this appropriation; and I hope the amendment will fail.

Mr. GEORGE. When I was interrupted by the Senator from Alabama I was expressing some views which I entertain upon the amendment of the Senator from Illinois which had been voted down, and I was giving some reasons why I cast my vote against it. I desire to place upon record the statement that I do not think the amount proposed by the Senator from Illinois was extravagant or was beyond the needs of the people of this country for the purposes of education. I would cheerfully vote for that amount. I voted against the amendment solely upon the ground that I believe a larger sum than $77,000,000 (that amount having once received the sanction of the Senate and the larger sum having been voted down) is not likely to be passed at all, and I prefer in this matter to take the deliberate judgment of the Senate as expressed at the last Congress and the deliberate judgment of the committee, of which I am no longer a member, expressed at this session, and to vote for a sum which I think we may get out of the Treasury to assist in the education of the people.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the school-house fund to be a part of the $77,000,000?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. In response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama about this being a local want, I understand him somewhat to insinuate a constitutional objection to this appropriation because the want is not general, but local. My answer to that is that it necessarily rests in the discretion of Congress in making such an appropriation to determine how far the want is local and how far it is general. In addition to that, an answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama is found in the fact that this appropriation for school-houses is but a part of the scheme to educate the people; it is only a part of the means of education; and if we have a right under the Constitution to make an appropriation for the purpose of educating the illiterate and poor people of this country, certainly we have the further right to vote to them houses, without which the education can not be given to them. I think that is a complete answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to suggest in connection with what the Senator from Alabama has said that I suppose an appropriation for the Coosa or some other river down in Alabama would be a local appropriation, would it not?

Mr. GEORGE. You are after the Senator from Alabama, not after me.

Mr. PUGH. What is the question?

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that I think an appropriation for the benefit of the Coosa River would be a local appropriation, yet I do not suppose any one would object to it on constitutional grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I now desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, Senators are no doubt advised of the great affliction which has befallen my colleague. Mrs. Hawley died last evening at half past 6 o'clock. There are to be simple funeral services at the residence of my colleague, at No. 312 C street, at 5 o'clock this afternoon. Many Senators have already left for the purpose of attending, and others desire by their presence to testify their sympathy for my colleague in his great bereavement. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. S. K. COX, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of Congress the seventeenth annual report of the board of Indian commissioners of the year 1885, submitted to the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of the act of May 17, 1882.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 3, 1886.

ARTILLERY SCHOOL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence with officers of the artillery school at Fortress Monroe recommending appropriation for extra-duty pay to enlisted men employed at that school; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON RETAIL LIQUOR DEALERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue and recommending amendments of the acts in relation to penalties for carrying on the business of retail liquor dealers without the payment of tax; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT FOR 1885.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VIELE. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill H. R. 5552. It requires no expenditure of money. It does a simple act of justice, and I think will lead to no discussion.

Mr. BEACH. Is that bill on the Private Calendar or the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BEACH. Then it can not be brought up under the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill (H. R. 5552) for the relief of James Cain was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STORM. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House require that in every case a report shall accompany the bill.

Mr. STORM. I would like to hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report would be in the nature of debate. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to have the report read reserving the right to object?

Mr. STORM. If the gentleman will explain the bill that will do as well.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if there is a report accompanying this bill I would like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The report can not be read except by unanimous consent unless the bill is under consideration, because that would be in the nature of debate; but if there be no objection the report will be read subject to the right to object afterward.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to object, but it seems to me that we ought not to fall into the habit of hearing reports and the extended debate which is sometimes indulged in in such cases before the question of objection is raised. It seems to me that it should first be determined whether or not there is objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] objects to the reading of the report.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, however.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

PAY OF JUDGES OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. SENEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely bills (H. R. 88, H. R. 594, H. R. 3704, and S. 6) regulating the pay of the district judges of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to—I do not know whether it is a question of privilege or how it should be stated, but it is this: In the absence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] this morning the Committee on the Judiciary took different action upon this subject, and it occurs to me that as the gentleman was not aware of that fact the report ought to be withdrawn for the present.

The SPEAKER. This is in part a report upon a Senate bill, and the bill does not accompany the report.

Mr. SENEY. The report is based on three bills, two of the House and one of the Senate, and a copy of each bill accompanies the report.

The SPEAKER. One of the bills to which the report relates appears to be a Senate bill, and it does not accompany the report.

Mr. SENEY. The bill was put into the report by me only a moment ago and sent up to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. There is accompanying the report a printed copy of the Senate bill, but the House must act upon the original engrossed bill, the official paper, as it comes from the Senate.

Mr. SENEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is proper to be done under the circumstances. I was instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make that report to the House. The report was prepared last week, and would have been made before only that it was delayed at the request of a member of the committee in order that he might have an opportunity to examine it. Had I been in my seat yesterday morning it would have been presented then. Coming into the House this morning, I thought it proper when the Committee on the Judiciary was called that I should present the report to the House, and I was not aware until afterward that the committee this morning had changed its order on the subject. Whatever is proper to be done in the matter I am, of course, quite willing to do.

Mr. OATES. I do not understand that the committee has changed its order except that there is a motion to reconsider pending.

Mr. ROGERS. That is all. If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one observation. The facts have been correctly stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY], and it would not have been necessary at all for me to have called the attention of the Speaker to the last action of the committee on this matter had the gentleman from Ohio happened to be present in the committee-room this morning when that action was taken.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has already stated, the original Senate bill does not accompany the report, and a report on a Senate bill can not be received unless accompanied by the bill itself.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then, Mr. Speaker, the report is out of order at this time for a different reason from the one stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill has not been reported back to the House.

Mr. ROGERS. The object of my remark was to prevent the House from getting the impression that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] had knowingly doing anything wrong.

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Speaker, let the report be considered withdrawn.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE ILLINOIS AND DES MOINES RIVERS.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3371) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Illinois River in the State of Illinois and the Des Moines River in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-RAILWAY.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the leave heretofore granted by the House, and in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Commerce, I present their views on House bill No. 5885 to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship Railway.

The paper was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 333) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois please state whether this bill makes an appropriation or requires an appropriation to be made.

Mr. HITT. The bill by its provisions requires an appropriation, but does not expressly make it.

The bill and accompanying report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. M. E. A. FERGUSON.

Mr. ELLSBERRY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1925) for the relief of Mrs. M. E. A. Ferguson; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY A. FITZPATRICK.

On motion of Mr. ELLSBERRY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1780) granting a pension to Mary A. Fitzpatrick; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

S. B. CRANSTON.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 68) for the relief of S. B. Cranston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Claims, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1975) for the relief of S. B. Cranston; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. CATHERINE B. CULVER.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Claims, also reported a bill (H. R. 6396) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine B. Culver; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN F. SLATER.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calander, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LANDS FOR CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HENLEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 5164) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2293) to promote agriculture, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3426) to incorporate the American College for the Blind; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION OF ANATOMICAL SCIENCE.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 2632) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ASHEVILLE, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills heretofore reported by committees begins at twenty-three minutes before 1 o'clock.

Mr. DIBBLE (when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was called) said: I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C., and I ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes. The bill has already been before the House three different times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill indicated by him, and, pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana (in his seat), objected.

The SPEAKER. Who objects?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is this a bill for the erection of a public building?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If there is any necessity for debate at all I do not see what good ten minutes' debate can do. But I will withdraw the objection. I can stand it if gentlemen on the other side can.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the order limiting debate will be made.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. DIBBLE that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story, for the use and accommodation of the courts of the United States, post-office, and other offices of the Government, at Asheville, N. C. The site, and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $80,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor place for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum of $80,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building independent and unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of North Carolina shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil processes therein.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all debate upon the pending bill has been limited to ten minutes. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina to control one-half of that time, and if any gentleman desires to oppose the bill the Chair will recognize him for that purpose to control the other half of the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report of the committee be read.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be read in the time of some gentleman occupying the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask by unanimous consent the report may be read, not to take up any portion of the ten minutes.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think, Mr. Chairman, a statement by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], who is perfectly familiar with the subject, will substitue all the facts set forth in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana as controlling the five minutes in opposition, and if he desires in that time the report can be read.

Mr. DIBBLE. There is a misprint in the bill; the word "place" should be substituted by the word "plan," so it will read "and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury," &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the correction will be made accordingly.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, this is a bill providing for the erection of a court-house in the city of Asheville, N. C. It has passed the Senate three several times—in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses—appropriating $100,000, and each time it has received a favorable report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House but has failed to pass because it was not reached on the Calendar. At this session it was introduced appropriating $100,000, but the committee have reduced it to $80,000, which I think is too small, but at the same time I have to submit to it. The United States court sits in the city of Asheville, a circuit and district court, organized there for fourteen years. It is the largest Federal court in North Carolina. It is situated 200 miles west of any public building in the State. There are now pending before that court four hundred cases to be tried. I have the certificate of the judge of the court, which says that since its establishment there have been over four thousand cases disposed of. On account of the increasing population and business of the State there has been established a State court in addition to the Federal court, and often conflicts arise between the two. I myself have seen the Federal court adjourn because of conflict between it and the State courts.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, there is no place for taking proper care of the records of the Federal court. The clerk's office, where the records of fifteen years are kept, is a building distant from the court-house and liable at any time to be destroyed by fire. It is in a second-story room, where if a fire occurred no doubt the entire records of the courts would be destroyed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is this for a court-house only or for a post-office and other buildings?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. It is for a court-house, for a post-office, for a revenue office, and for other purposes set forth in the report.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. From the number of cases stated by the gentleman as pending before the court it would seem that they also want a jail.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. We would like to have one, but we have one there now which is satisfactory for the present. The present building is intended to supply the want of accommodation for the various public offices located in that city.

Mr. McCOMAS. What internal-revenue office is located in Asheville?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. The deputy collector of internal revenue for the western district.

Mr. McCOMAS. The deputy collector?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is that a good precedent to establish—to erect public buildings for the accommodation of deputy collectors?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. It might not, but there is also a Federal court sitting there which has been in existence for over fourteen years, and the records of which are now exposed to loss by fire. There is also a post-office there to be provided for. The facts are fully set forth in the report accompanying the bill, which also states the amount of rent paid by the Government, the number of population, and other facts showing the necessity for this public building. My time of course is limited, but I will be glad to answer any suggestion on the part of gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from North Carolina has one minute of his time left.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I will reserve that for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will be recognized as controlling the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ought not to be recognized with a view of opposing the measure. Therefore if anybody wishes to oppose the measure I will yield him the floor. If no one rises for that purpose I will occupy the floor to say this: During the last Congress I repeatedly stated the main objections in the country to the erection of public buildings was the large appropriations made for each one, and the fact that those appropriations were made without proper safeguards against demands for subsequent additional appropriations. I am glad to notice this bill meets both objections which I have been so persistent in making—first, as the amount seems to be reasonable for such a building where there has been established a Federal court for fourteen years, which would indicate the necessity for such a building; and secondly, in incorporating proper safeguards against additional appropriations hereafter. It is provided this money is to be expended only on the plan made and after the site has been purchased, so as to secure with reasonable certainty the amount indicated in the bill shall be sufficient to complete the structure. The adoption of such safeguards in my judgment renders legislation of this character much more satisfactory and much safer than where no safeguards are adopted against future demands for additional appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is due to the committee to state that five minutes of the time allowed for debate should be given to those desiring to oppose the bill. If any gentleman desires to speak in opposition to it the Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. DIBBLE. No one rising to oppose the bill, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendment to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration House bill No. 5546, had directed him to report the same with an amendment to the House and recommend its passage as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill does not contain an appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. No, sir.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BELFAST, ME.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1027) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me.; and I ask unanimous consent that the same limit of debate granted on the preceding bill, to be equally divided in case there shall be any opposition to the passage of the bill, be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. What is this bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is only an extension or addition to this building at Belfast, Me., and involves an expenditure of only $15,000.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request of the gentleman from South Carolina will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. DIBBLE was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole

House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed an extension of the public building at Belfa-t, in the State of Maine, in accordance with plans and specifications of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and also to put said building in a thorough state of repair; and for the purposes herein named the sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House all debate is limited on this bill to ten minutes, and the Chair will recognize the same principle in the distribution and allotment of the time that was observed on the preceding bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the purpose of extending a public building which is already in existence in the town of Belfast, Me., which is the property of the Government, so that it shall have sufficient capacity to do the Government business in; and I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury upon this subject as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 26, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant in regard to bill No. 1027, H. R., for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me. I am informed by the Supervising Architect of this Department that the amount ($15,000) asked in the estimate of appropriations recently submitted to Congress for the custom-house, &c., at Belfast, Me., is for the construction of an extension to the building to provide adequate accommodations for the post-office business, for which plans and specifications have been submitted to the Department by the superintendent of repairs for that section. The extension contemplated is 20 feet by 45 feet 8 inches, the full height of the building (two stories).

The present post-office accommodations consist of a post-office working-room 23 feet 8 inches by 16 feet 6 inches, and a room 16 feet 6 inches by 8 feet 8 inches, which is used by the postmaster and for the money-order business. The extension will provide room for the postmaster 18 feet by 8 feet 6 inches, a money-order room 18 .eet by 8 feet 6 inches, increase the size of the working-room to 36 feet by 23 feet, and provide a room in second story for the inspectors of customs 24 feet 3 inches by 18 feet 6 inches, and a files-room 18 feet by 8 feet 6 inches.

The present building is a two-story brick fire-proof structure, with two rooms on each floor. No external ornamentation is contemplated on the extension. The office handles seven daily mails, and is the distributing center for fifty-four post-offices in Waldo County. The present accommodations are too restricted, and about one hundred more boxes could be rented if they could be put up.

The estimated cost of the extension, of fire-proof construction, is $15,000.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL DIBBLE,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not desire at this time to say anything further in support of this bill unless there is debate on the other side, in which case I will reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any gentleman for five minutes who may desire to oppose the bill. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 1027, directed him to report the same to the House without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SAVANNAH, GA.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill 5547, and I ask the same unanimous consent as to the limitation of debate to ten minutes that was made in the preceding cases.

Mr. CANNON. What is this bill?

Mr. DIBBLE. It is for the erection of a public building at Savannah, Ga.

Mr. EDEN. I would suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he modify his request so that the report may be read first, and then allow ten minutes for debate, so that we may understand the bill better.

Mr. DIBBLE. If any gentleman desires to have the report read I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request of the gentleman from South Carolina will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. DIBBLE's motion was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts and post-office, and other Government uses, at the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia. The site, and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $200,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site or place for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $200,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States nor until the State of Georgia shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The CHAIRMAN. If any gentleman desires the report to be read the Chair will direct the Clerk to read it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. EDEN. Let it be read.

The report (by Mr. REESE) was read, as follows:

The United States Government, about forty years ago, erected a granite building in Savannah, to be used as a custom-house and for the holding therein of the United States circuit and district courts, and as a post-office. The post-office was in the basement, or on the first floor; the collector's offices and United States marshal's office were on the second floor, and the third floor was used by the courts. The bonded warehouse was on the first floor. The post-office was dark and always damp, and wholly unsuited for the purpose. The court-room (on the third floor) was found, from its first occupation, to be unfitted for the proper hearing of cases. This room is on the corner of two streets, which are the principal avenues of the commerce of that city, and as one of them is paved with stone, the almost incessant roar from drays and wagons frequently interrupts the business of the court. This is the case now. Another and remediless difficulty and obstruction to judicial business exists in the acoustics of the court-room. Two experiments have been made by the Government to prevent this difficulty, and both were wholly unsuccessful.

Your committee had before them letters from several judges who have presided over the circuit and district courts in that room, and among them are Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Justice Woods, of the United States Supreme Court, and Hon. John Erskine, retired United States judge. And without further remarks on this head, your committee say that such a room for holding the United States circuit and district court is a discredit to this Government.

Your committee beg leave to submit the full text of the letters of Mr. Justice Bradley and Hon. John Erskine as a part of their report. They would submit, also, Mr. Justice Woods's letter had they it in hand, though it is of the same purport as the two letters submitted. Mr. Justice Woods says that the United States court-room in Savannah is the worst for holding court in the whole of the fifth United States judicial district, which extends from the Savannah River to the Rio Grande.

After the war, when the internal-revenue system was extended South, the Government moved the post-office from the basement of the customs building into a rented house and occupied said basement for the internal-revenue service, and it is so used now.

The post-office is, and for many years has been, in the basement of a rented building. The delivery department is entered by five or six descending steps; the room is dark and poorly ventilated, and the space where mail-bags are received and emptied, letters assorted and stamped and delivered and key-boxes stationed, is about 83 by 18 feet. In fact, all the business of the office, which serves about 60,000 people, and is besides a distributing point for a large territory, is done in the small room, excepting the sale of stamps, registering of valuable packages, and the issuing of money-orders.

Besides the inadequacy of this basement room, the situation of it is most inconvenient for the ladies of the city. It is on the same noisy street which the custom-house is on, which street is next to the river, and one on which ladies object to walking. The location of the post-office, therefore, is so objectionable that ladies rarely go to it to post or receive letters.

Your committee are convinced that a building for holding United States courts and a post-office in Savannah is a necessity. The custom-house, being built of granite and iron and brick, so as to be fire proof, could not be remodeled for that purpose even if it was located in a quiet part of the city. A court-room with the objections pointed out by the three judges named is a reproach to our Government. It is a denial of justice to all parties to a suit for a judge and jury to sit in a room where the judge must leave the bench and sit or stand by the jury in order to be heard, and where counsel, witnesses, jurors, and judge are straining to hear what is said, and where the judge must suspend proceedings to wait until the roar of wheels dies away.

Your committee therefore report back House bill 3880 with a substitute therefor, and recommend that the substitute do pass.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, the nineteenth line of this bill contains the same misprint of the word "place" for plans, which occurred in a former bill, and I ask that it be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House debate is limited to ten minutes. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina for five minutes in support of the bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD].

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. Chairman, there are two letters attached to this report, which have not been read, one by Mr. Justice Bradley and one by Judge Erskine, late judge of the district court, and there is also a letter from Justice Woods and one from the presiding judge, Speer, on the same subject, all of which go to show that the court is held in a room in the custom-house in Savannah in which it is impossible to transact the business to the satisfaction of parties, jurors, or of the court; and Judge Bradley says he has long desired that there should be another court-house there, while Judge Woods states that it is the worst court-house within the fifth district—a district extending as it does from the Savannah River to the Rio Grande.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will ask my colleague does it not actually happen that policemen have often to be stationed there to stop the passage of drays, &c., that the proceedings of the court may go on?

Mr. NORWOOD. That has been done time and again at the request of the judge. The building is situated at the corner of two of the principal business streets of the city, that are paved with stone, and the roar of the wheels from wagons, drays, and the like is such as to drown the voices of the witnesses, the counsel, and the court, and they can not conduct the business while that noise is being made. The acoustics of the court-room are such that Judge Erskine says he has often got down from the bench and sat by the jury in making his charge in order that the jury might hear him.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds report that under such circumstances a court-house there is a necessity. And when it is remembered that that court-house is in the city of Savannah, where the admiralty business is conducted, and it is for the accommodation of both the district and circuit courts, and that there is a very large amount of business transacted in that court, I do not think any gentleman here would hesitate to say that the report of the committee is correct.

As to the post-office, I will say the net proceeds of the post-office are a little over $36,000 a year. The post-office is now in a basement. You descend four or five steps in order to get into the post-office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] has expired. The Chair will recognize any gentleman who desires to oppose the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire only to ask a question. The present building, as I understand, is occupied as a custom-house, internal-revenue office, and court-house.

Mr. NORWOOD. Yes, sir; and for the clerks of the court and the marshal and the storage of records. I will state, if allowed to do so, that many of the records of the court now are stored in the upper room and are not being preserved. Some of the records of the most important trials that have occurred in that court are now being destroyed because there is not room to stow them away properly.

Mr. HOLMAN. My question is this: I understand the present building was erected some forty years ago, and is used now as a custom-house, internal-revenue office, and court-house—for those three purposes; and it is proposed now to erect a building with a view to a post-office, which is not in this building, and the use of the courts; and the present building will be used as a custom-house and for the internal-revenue office. Now the question I wish to ask is this: In view of the fact that this building is to be for those two purposes only, the post-office and the court-house, whether a less sum than $200,000, under all the circumstances, would not be sufficient for the erection of the building?

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not think so. Out of this amount is to come the cost of the purchase of the ground, which may take twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars. You will observe that by a provision of the bill a strip of ground 50 feet wide is to be purchased, besides the ground to be actually occupied by the building, because it can not be erected within 50 feet of any other building; and we can not get ground in the portion of the city that would be suitable for this building at a low price. A high price may have to be paid for the ground, and the remainder of the $200,000 will not be more than is required for the building. It should be remembered that that building must accommodate the district court, circuit court, the clerk, the marshal, and the post-office department to supply a population of some 60,000, and be a distributing office for a large district. I think the sum named in the bill is very reasonable. I asked for $300,000, but the committee cut it down to $200,000.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5547) for the erection of a public building at Savannah, Ga., had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN PEORIA.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 368) in relation to a public building in Peoria, Ill., and I ask unanimous consent that debate on the bill be limited to ten minutes, five minutes on each side.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that the report be read before the time for debate commences.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, it was ordered that the report should be read, and thereafter the debate should be limited to ten minutes.

The motion that the House resolve into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 368) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882, be so amended as to extend the limitation of $225,000 to $275,000, for the purpose of completing a third story according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and of purchasing additional ground for said annex.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendment:

At the end of section 1 add the following:

"Said additional ground not to cost over $16,000; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be made available until a valid title to said additional ground shall be vested in the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General."

The report (by Mr. WORTHINGTON) was read, as follows:

Your committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 368) to extend the limitation for the erection of a public building at Peoria and to purchase additional grounds therefor, reports as follows:

The original bill provided for the erection of a public building at a cost of $225,000. Of this amount about $40,000 has been expended for a site, leaving $185,000 for erecting and completing the building. Plans were drawn and contracts let looking to this limit; but these provided for a building of two stories only. It requires all of one story for the accommodation of the post-office and all of one for the revenue offices, leaving no accommodation for Federal courts whatever, unless a third story was erected. It was also found after the building was in process of erection that the first story, designed for the post-office, was entirely inadequate for the accommodation of this department.

Ten railroads diverge from Peoria, making it a great railroad center and distributing point for mail matter. The room afforded by the new building for the post-office is no greater than that now furnished by the leased building used for that purpose, which is entirely inadequate even for present population and business of the city of Peoria. The gross receipts of the post-office for the last year were $68,170, and the net receipts $46,083. The only way to remedy this lack of room for postal facilities is by building a one-story annex. To do this additional ground is required.

The internal revenue collected at Peoria is greater than at any other city in the United States, being for the last year over $13,000,000. This, of course, requires a large force of clerks in connection with the collector's office, and of store-keepers and gaugers, who have almost daily business with the office.

The population of Peoria is about 45,000, and is rapidly increasing. The bill reported, as amended by your committee, limits the amount to be expended in purchasing additional ground to $16,000, which amount your committee believes will be sufficient for that purpose. This leaves of the additional $50,000 asked for $34,000 for the erection of said proposed annex and the completion of the original building, making the total cost $275,000, an amount which your committee deems very reasonable for the largest internal-revenue-tax paying city in the United States.

In view of these facts your committee recommends the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: After the word "annex," in the twelfth line of section 1, add the words "said additional ground not to cost over $16,000, and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to said additional ground shall be vested in the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General."

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, this matter is quite fully presented by the report, and the great necessity for public offices in the city of Peoria is so generally known that I do not care to consume time in making any remarks on the subject unless some gentleman has something to say in opposition to the bill. I desire, therefore, to reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any gentleman who desires to speak in opposition to the bill for five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no Federal court now held in Peoria.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. No, sir; but two bills authorizing the holding of terms of Federal courts there have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and there is a bill now pending before the House for the same purpose, which I think will soon be called up.

Mr. HOLMAN. When a bill on this subject first passed in 1882 it provided, I believe, for the erection of a court-house as well as a post-office building.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is some four years ago, and no Federal court has yet been authorized at that point.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That was simply because the subject could not be brought before the House. The bill was reported favorably in that Congress and in the last Congress. As far back as twelve years ago the matter was presented, and it has been favorably reported at different times since.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Federal courts are held now at only two points in the State of Illinois, Chicago and Springfield.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that under these circumstances this proposed legislation is somewhat peculiar. Four years ago, without any law authorizing a Federal court to be held at Peoria, an appropriation of money was made to erect a building there for a court-house. It is quite manifest that for the purposes of internal-revenue offices and a post-office the sum of money named is very large, a good deal larger than the average amount appropriated for such purposes at other places, and it seems to me, with all due deference to the views of my friend from Illinois, that the plan of providing at this time for constructing a large building at Peoria, with reference to the accommodation of the Federal courts, is not judicious. As everybody knows, the main item of expense in the erection of these public buildings is in providing facilities for the courts, and I hardly think it should be done until Congress has first determined that the Federal courts shall be held there. Another fact I wish to call attention to is this:

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury clearly was not justifiable in adopting a plan such as was adopted in this case. The increased expenditure which seems to be now inevitable, because apparently a third story is proper under the circumstances, results from the Supervising Architect having exceeded his powers, and it shows very clearly the importance of the provision incorporated upon bills of this character by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, requiring all the preliminary steps to be taken before any money is expended, to the end that there shall be some wholesome restraint imposed upon the Supervising Architect.

I hardly feel justified in opposing a measure like this, which seems in some respects to be right enough. I am aware that for years there has been an effort on the part of some of the people of Illinois to have Federal courts established at this point, and if that had been determined upon, if a real necessity for this proposed building existed, the case would be different; but it is very doubtful whether there should be a Federal court established at Peoria. The business of those courts is very well divided now between the two points I have mentioned, Springfield and Chicago, and the experience of other States—my own, for instance, in which additional points have been provided for the holding of the courts—has been found very unsatisfactory. I think, therefore, that the people of Illinois would not be benefited by the establishment of courts at Peoria. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to point out any objections to this measure except, first, the large sum which it proposes to appropriate; and second, the fact that there is no necessity for it at this time, as no Federal court has yet been authorized to be held at that point.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that the case of the city of Peoria is peculiar. It requires so large a provision of office-room for the Federal officers engaged in collecting the immense tax of that district, amounting to nearly $14,000,000, that the question of accommodation for the Federal courts is really scondary to the question of providing for the revenue offices. However, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to spend further time in the discussion of the question, and therefore I move the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague [Mr. WORTHINGTON] will permit me, I will say that I think there is an evident necessity for the holding of terms of the Federal courts at Peoria. In our State, which is very large and becoming quite populous, Federal courts are held at only two points, Chicago and Springfield. Peoria, which, as remarked by my colleague, is a very important point so far as the collection of revenue is concerned and important also as a manufacturing and commercial city, is clearly the proper place for holding an additional term of the Federal courts in the State of Illinois. The Committee on the Judiciary has reported a bill to this House providing for the establishment of courts there. I know nothing about the peculiar necessity existing for additional room and for this increase in the size of the proposed public building—my colleague can inform the committee about that—but as to the necessity for holding terms of court at Peoria, I am quite satisfied that it exists, and that it ought to be provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] moves that the amendment reported by the committee be agreed to. The amendment will be read.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 12, after the word "annex," insert "said additional ground not to cost over $16,000; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be made available until a valid title to said additional ground shall be vested in the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 368) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment and with the recommendation that the bill as amended be passed.

The question being taken on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building by the United States Government at Rochester, N. Y., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $500,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of said building and for the payment for the site thereof; and said additional sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act and for the purpose of enlarging and increasing the said building and the site therefor.

SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making plans and contracts for the erection of said building.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of existing law relating to said building be so amended as to require an open space of not less than 20 feet, in lieu of 40 feet, as provided by the act of May 25, 1882.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees has expired. Under the rule the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5549) limiting the cost of the erection of a public building at Rochester, N. Y., had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, before moving to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the pension appropriation bill, I shall be glad to have some understanding with the House as to a limitation of time for general debate. I was myself opposed to any considerable general debate on this bill, but the debate having been sprung upon the House, quite a number of members have manifested an earnest desire to engage in the discussion. I have no wish to fix any other limit than what may be considered a reasonable length of time. I suggest, therefore, that when we resume the consideration of the pension appropriation bill all debate on the bill be limited to four hours.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman to propose that those four hours be divided by allowing two hours to each side of the House?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I propose that the time allotted by the House be divided equally between the two sides.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, if the proposition be agreeable to the rest of the House. I have not consulted with members on the Republican side.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that by allowing four hours more for general debate he will not get a vote on this bill to-day. It seems to me we might get through this bill in less time than that. We have already spent several days upon it—a thing unprecedented with a pension bill. I think we had better vote this money promptly for pensions than to spend much more time in discussion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There are a great many gentlemen who desire to have at least this much time allowed for debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not practicable to dispose of this bill at 5 o'clock to-night? That will allow three hours and twenty minutes, to be divided equally.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If that arrangement be agreeable to the House, it can of course be adopted. But I think we had better agree among ourselves without any controversy. I understand that a limitation of four hours is satisfactory to gentlemen on both sides.

Mr. RANDALL. Why can we not agree to allow three hours and twenty minutes, instead of four hours, for debate, and then vote at 5 o'clock, so as to pass the bill to-day?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think it would be better to make the agreement I have suggested, because there has been an understanding that it would be satisfactory on both sides.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If that arrangement be made, is it understood a vote will be taken this evening? If not, it may give gentlemen an opportunity to do some Department work to-day.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If it be understood that everybody is going to vote for the bill, there will be no necessity for taking a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say that I hope the bill will be finally disposed of at the end of the general debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is inevitable, I presume, because there is nobody opposed to the bill; but my question was whether there would be a vote on the bill this evening, or whether it would be understood that the bill is to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the previous question to be called to-night?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this debate goes on, it is my intention to call the previous question this evening on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let the previous question be considered as ordered at the end of four hours.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is necessary, of course, we should resolve ourselves into the Committee of the Whole under the rules.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the time be extended to five hours it will carry the bill over until to morrow, which is private bill day.

Mr. CABELL. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the vote can be taken on this bill to-day, and it ought to be taken and the bill disposed of.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope gentlemen on the other side do not wish to occupy the time to-morrow which is devoted under the rules to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And that the previous question be considered as ordered at the end of four hours.

Mr. CANNON. I have had my hour, and so far as I am individually concerned it does not make any difference to me when the vote is taken, but there are several gentlemen who wish to speak on the bill, and if it is to be determined the bill is to be disposed of at the end of four hours they will be cut off. Why not say that at the end of five hours the general debate shall be closed? [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. McMILLIN. There is an order already made by the House setting apart Saturday of each week until further order for debate only, no business to be transacted. If the suggestion be adopted that the debate be extended to five hours, then we will not be able to get a vote to-day; and as to-morrow is private bill day and Saturday is devoted to debate only, necessarily the bill will go over until next week. In my judgment we ought to have a vote to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let there be an understanding that to-morrow shall be devoted to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Several gentlemen insist upon being heard, and therefore I would suggest that two and a half hours be allowed on each side, at the end of which time the vote shall be taken.

Mr. REED, of Maine. With the understanding there shall be no yea-and-nay vote, which will save an hour.

Mr. McMILLIN. The rules require there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill. Any member may insist upon it. It is a good rule and should be observed.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion before the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move, then, Mr. Speaker—or I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to make the motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My proposition, Mr. Speaker, is that four hours be the limit of the general debate. If the gentleman from Iowa wishes to move his amendment he can do so, extending the time to five hours.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will move then that two hours and a half be granted to each side of the House, making five hours in all, of general debate; after which the vote shall be taken.

Mr. REED, of Maine. With the understanding that the yea-and-nay vote is not to be taken.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, that is not agreed to.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If a yea-and-nay vote be taken, that will extend the time to six hours.

Mr. HOLMAN. That can be waived, as the vote will be unanimous.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, I do not wish the House to get into the habit of waiving that very good rule.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The vote will be unanimous.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know it will be, but let us observe the rule which provides for a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of one of the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. If the amendment made by the gentleman from Iowa be adopted, giving two hours and a half to each side, it will necessarily involve an amendment to the rules, which give to each member who gets the floor in general debate but an hour, and that proposed amendment to the rules will require unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My motion is to give four hours, and the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is to make it five hours.

The SPEAKER. He also proposes that it shall be equally divided, which will require unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIN. If I am permitted to move an amendment, I should like to provide that the general debate shall be confined to the pending bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If the motion in reference to general debate be adopted, does that cut off the five-minute debate under the rules?

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition is to close general debate.

A MEMBER. I wish it to include all debate.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I object to extending the general debate for five hours.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the debate be closed in four hours.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And I move to amend by making it five.

The amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, was disagreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to make it three hours, but the object and effect of that will be to dispose of this bill to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If four hours is agreed upon it will be impossible to cut off the five-minute debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the House first agree in reference to the general debate. If the House does not want three hours they can vote it down

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It is understood, of course, this does not interfere with the five-minute debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Allow me to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that in my judgment his motion will not economize the time of the House, because gentlemen who insist upon being heard will under the rules occupy the floor under the five-minute debate.

Mr. RANDALL. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this bill has occupied time enough, and ought to be disposed of to-day.

Several MEMBERS. It has occupied too long a time already.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the vote and let the House determine the question.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. RANDALL'S amendment, limiting the time to three hours.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have another proposition to make. The Committee on Appropriations directed me this morning to state to the House to-day that as there was an extreme necessity for the immediate passage of the urgency deficiency bill on account of some three hundred workmen being thrown out of employment in the navy-yard and for various other reasons, that if the House saw proper to do so the pension bill might be temporarily laid aside and its consideration postponed until that bill can be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. But the House can not do that. Both of these bills are in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then it will be proper, when the consideration of the pension bill is reached, to ask that it be laid aside and the other bill taken up.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I only wished, Mr. Speaker, to make known the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to be understood as willing to consent to that arrangement if it met the approval of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the disposition of the House is to finish this bill promptly and then proceed with the other.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have discharged my duty in making known the fact, that the urgency deficiency bill may be taken up and disposed of at once if the House sees proper.

I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. CRISP in the chair).

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of appropriation bills.

By order of the House general debate on the pension appropriation bill has been limited to three hours.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to lay aside the pension appropriation bill temporarily with a view of calling up, if no other gentleman submits the motion, the urgent deficiency bill, which may be passed I think in a very few minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I trust that will not be done. We have had this bill pending here for days and a lengthy discussion upon it. It is to be hoped that we will get rid of it at some time, and think now is the time to conclude it, and not postpone it from time to time to stand in the way of other public business that ought to be promptly transacted.

Mr. RANDALL. We can pass both of these bills this afternoon.

Mr. CANNON. I am not so sanguine upon that point as my friend from Pennsylvania is.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is a disposition on the part of the House to dispose of them promptly. I insist that we do it in regular order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It should be remembered, too, that we are to take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill under your absurd rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. If gentlemen will not insist on occupying so much time in discussion we can pass both bills in a very short time. I object to laying this bill aside. Let us dispose of it now.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. It is important that the urgent deficiency bill should be considered at once. Already, for two weeks past, the work upon the armor for the new cruisers has been suspended, three hundred men have been discharged from the Washington navy-yard. Some of them are suffering for the want of employment, and it is important to the Government that this work should be pushed to early completion. It is therefore important that this appropriation be made forthwith.

Mr. ROGERS. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to laying aside the pension bill, the committee will rise and report the fact to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having been in session for the consideration of general appropriation bills, a proposition was made to lay aside temporarily the pension appropriation bill, being the first bill on the Calendar, which was objected to. The committee had accordingly risen and directed him to report that fact to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the committee be directed to lay aside the pension appropriation bill for the present?

Mr. CANNON. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 89.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope not. We can pass this bill to-day and the other too if gentlemen are willing.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I hope we may get these three hundred men at work. I insist upon the demand.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 43 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 149, not voting 71; as follows:

So the House refused to direct the Committee of the Whole to lay aside the bill (H. R. 5201).

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

There was no objection.

The following members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. LAIRD, from March 1.

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. REESE with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

The following members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. HILL with Mr. COOPER.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. HISCOCK.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, with Mr. LOUTTIT.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. ELLSBERRY with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. WEST.

Mr. MILLER, of Texas, with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. REESE] is absent by leave of the House, his absence being caused by sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session (Mr. CRISP in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill is limited to three hours. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, by the courtesy of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] I have ten minutes allowed me to speak upon the pending question. I shall not enter into a general discussion of the merits of this bill; but I do desire to point out one or two errors into which my colleague from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] seems to have fallen in trying to account for the great personal and political disaster that seems to have befallen him during the memorable campaign of 1884. I want to do that only for the purpose of defending the late Commissioner of Pensions from the unwarranted, unjust, and I think wholly uncalled-for assault that was made upon him. I had some knowledge of what was going on in Ohio politics in 1884 myself. It was a remarkable year in that State. Ohio stood out in the forefront of the contest, and her voice in October was understood to be prophetic of the voice of the whole country in the coming November election.

So it was that both political parties put forth their best efforts to carry the State. Prominent upon the ticket for Congressman was my friend the gentleman whose name I have already mentioned. It so happened that that gentleman was not as successful in carrying the banner of his party in his Congressional district as he had hoped to be. And not only had he himself suffered a misfortune, but it was apparent to all of us that by some means or other the contest had affected the ticket in his district. And now he comes here and argues because of that fact, because of that misfortune, because of that peculiar personal result in his district, therefore General Dudley, the head of the Pension Department of the Government, used the machinery of his office to unfavorably affect the vote in his district.

I want to say here and now that I do not believe the evidence discloses or that the fact exists that General Dudley sent one man into my friend's Congressional district, or that there was any interference on the part of the Pension Department to affect his vote. I know it is customary—I have had troubles of the same kind, and, indeed, of a much worse character, and I know how natural it is, when a man gets up on the morning after the election and feels somewhat as though he had been sat down upon, to look around him and to attempt to attribute his misfortune to some great conspiracy against him. We are all liable in such a case to look in every direction except within. We nearly all of us are inclined to attribute our misfortunes to some overpowering act of Providence or to somebody else, and very seldom lay them at our own door. I want to show my friend has made this mistake in this particular instance, and therefore it is he has come here with this argument of his.

What is the gentleman's argument? He points out two facts; one was the presence of General Dudley in Ohio participating in a political campaign, and the second was his own personal misfortune in his own Congressional district. And without any other evidence than that he argues that these two facts existing it must be that General Dudley did it. It is the argument a posteriori, and generally it depends for its importance on the vivid imagination of the man who makes it. Now, it so happened my friend was a member of the then current Congress, the Forty-eighth Congress, and he was chairman of the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay; and it so happened that he put himself in a most awkward position toward the soldiers of his Congressional district.

A committee of the Grand Army of the Republic came to Washington and made arguments in behalf of the amendments which we have so long sought to ingraft upon the statutes of the country before the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] was chairman, and we left the committee-room assured, as we understood it, that General WARNER was in favor of adopting the amendments which our committee had procured to be put upon the Mexican pension bill in the Senate. I want to be distinctly understood. I say that is how we understood the case, and that is how we stated it to the soldiers of his Congressional district.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the gentleman does not intend to have it go out that he gathered that inference from anything which I said to him as chairman of that committee or anything that was said by any member of the committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read the personal statement of three of the members of the committee of the Grand Army of the Republic who joined with me in presenting our petition and our case before the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] was chairman.

A MEMBER. State the substance of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to embody those three letters in my remarks. The substance of them is this.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They had better be read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state their substance.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, I would rather have them read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You have an hour, General WARNER, and I have only ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, I have not. I think the House would like to hear the letters read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let them be read out of your time, then.

Mr. WARNER. I have no time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The substance is that General Louis Wagner of Philadelphia, "Corporal" Tanner of New York, and General Merrill of Massachusetts, three gentlemen whose word will go anywhere they are known, state that General WARNER did promise and did pledge himself to us individually and collectively that he would vote for that measure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have those letters read. I have never seen them or heard of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They were published in the newspapers of the day and they were embodied in a speech made in the gentleman's district.

Unanimous consent was granted for the printing of the letters in connection with Mr. GROSVENOR'S speech. They are as follows:

LAWRENCE, MASS., September 8, 1884.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Absence for three or four days has delayed my reply to your letter.

You ask as to the action of the Grand Army committee on pensions as connected with the bill subsequently reported by Chairman WARNER.

My recollection of the matter is this: The national committee of the Grand Army of the Republic on pensions, in appearing before the Pension Committees of Congress, in addition to changes of voting for pensions in specific cases, urged the necessity of a modification of the laws regarding evidence, the loss of much testimony being inevitable from the death of witnesses during the lapse of twenty years.

It is agreed that the average of the new applications for pensions are of the most deserving character—of veterans who have combated a growing disability from wounds or disease, patriotically refusing to seek a pension until compelled from the sheer necessity of increasing infirmity.

The Congressional committee were unanimous in their expressions of concurrence with the views presented by the pension committee, and there was apparently no difference of opinion upon the point that if a veteran was entitled to a pension at all, he deserved it not from the hour of his delayed application, but from the date when the disability actually occurred.

But when the Warner bill was subsequently presented to Congress, while appearing to be the apple of promise to the eye, it was only ashes and bitterness within. There was attached to it the iniquitous provision that if a claimant saw fit to avail himself of its provisions—acknowledged to be necessary as an act of pure justice—he must agree to waive his claim to all arrears of pension and cancel the honest obligations to him from the beginning of his disability.

It was a deliberate attempt to cheat and defraud the soldier with a false and fraudulent pretense of fairness; an attempt to swindle maimed and suffering veterans out of their birthright by a cheap mess of pottage, and as such met the condemnation of the Grand Army committee, and which ought, as expressed in my telegram at that time, to have been buried a thousand feet deep.

If the circumstances did not demand the changes asked by our committee, there was no excuse for presenting this bill; if they did, then the addition of this clause of humiliation and fraud was an atrocious swindle.

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE S. MERRILL.

General C. H. GROSVENOR, Athens, Ohio.

OFFICE OF COLLECTOR OF TAXES,
Brooklyn, September 8, 1884.

MY DEAR FRIEND: There is one point in the Ohio election which is not only of general interest, but is of special interest to the veteran soldiers the nation over.

Our pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic recommended the giving of pensions to "all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and are dependent upon their own labor for support or are sixty-five years of age, without compelling them to prove at this date that such disability actually arose from the service."

The thought dominant in my mind when I framed that recommendation was that the bounden duty of the nation is to see that no one of its old defenders shall be subjected to the humiliation of ending his days in want or in the almshouse.

You know our committee had a plain understanding with the House committee and the assurance of General WARNER, the chairman, that this recommendation of ours should go through as presented. In the face of this at the last moment WARNER comes in with his famous amendment, which takes the life out of the whole matter and makes it a mockery or worse.

Gentlemen like Mr. WARNER must be taught that it is not to prove safe to play with soldiers' interests in the committee-rooms and on the floor of the House.

Every old soldier in that Congressional district owes it to the large number of his needy and suffering comrades in the country at large who look to us for assistance to make an example of WARNER and terminate his Congressional career now.

Hoping that result will be accomplished and earnestly advising every old soldier to participate in bringing it about,

I am, very truly, yours,

JAS. TANNER.

Gen. C. H. GROSVENOR.

PHILADELPHIA, September 8, 1884.

MY DEAR GENERAL: You ask for my recollection of the hearing granted our committee last spring by the Committee on Pensions, of which General WARNER, of your State, was chairman. I remember well our gratification at the assurance we had from the several members of the committee, but more especially from its chairman, that the points submitted by us met their cordial approval and that they would be presented to the House of Representatives in a properly drawn bill.

Greatly to our surprise and disappointment the bill was so amended in the House, and on the motion of the chairman, as to become a very objectionable measure, exactly the opposite of that submitted by us and accepted by the Committee on Pensions as just and proper.

This action of General WARNER caused the defeat of the bill, delaying the relief needed by and due to meritorious and disabled soldiers and sailors, who now have an opportunity, of which they should promptly and effectively avail themselves, of so amending the general's political existence that he may not be in a position in the next Congress to again prevent the enactment of proper pension laws.

I do not live in General WARNER'S district, but if I did I should assuredly vote for "the other man," whoever he is.

Yours, truly,

LOUIS WAGNER.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I denounce that statement as being utterly untrue whoever makes it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall have no personal contest with the gentleman. I remit him to the question of veracity between him and the three gentlemen whose names I have given. The soldiers of the gentleman's Congressional district believed the statement of those three men and refused to believe the statement of General WARNER, and that was the sole reason why they voted against him. One word further. I have said that I do not believe that Colonel Dudley ever used any of the machinery of the Pension Office against the gentleman from Ohio in his district. I will say further, that as late as the last day of September or the first of October in that year the gentleman from Ohio himself did not understand that Colonel Dudley was opposing him. And that is not all. I undertake to say that he understood that Colonel Dudley was his friend, and was fairly and justly administering the affairs of his office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have just three minutes longer to finish this.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I find the time is so limited that I shall be unable to say what I had prepared to say. I will therefore waive the opportunity of speaking in this debate, and give three minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. The rest of my time I must reserve for other gentlemen.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The fact is, the soldiers of the gentleman's Congressional district and of the State of Ohio have learned to draw the line between the men who merely profess friendship for them and those who act in a friendly manner, and have come to feel that men who promise them support and then come here and act differently are not to be trusted when they go back and ask to be given another term of office.

I deny, therefore, that General Dudley had anything to do with the misfortune of my friend; and he is wholly mistaken in supposing that his district was flooded with money or with the agents of the Pension Department. He talks about $25,000 having been spent by the Republican campaign committee. Does General WARNER suppose that the Republican committee of Ohio were so anxious to keep out of Congress a man who had been so long and so offensively a Republican—a man who had supported all the reconstruction policy of the Republican party—a man who had so often drawn from his pockets the captured pistols that he had taken away from the Democrats of Indiana and held them up to the terror of women and children as the "Democratic bibles" which he had captured—does he suppose that the Republican committee of Ohio desired to spend one-half of all its campaign fund to keep him out of Congress? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have never regretted that I voted for Mr. Lincoln.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LONG. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If I can be recognized I should like to reply to my colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. CABELL obtained the floor and said: I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the courtesy of my friend General CABELL not to make a speech, but to make a brief statement.

The subject ostensibly under consideration by the House is a bill to appropriate $75,000,000 for pensions. If one unacquainted with the proceedings of Congress should read some of the speeches made on this subject during the last few days he would no doubt be led to conclude that the members of this House from the Southern States were opposed to the passage of the bill, and opposed to granting pensions to the Union soldiers, and that they were being bitterly denounced for their sectionalism and want of patriotism. What are the real facts: For ten years past, during which time I have been continuously a member of this House, a pension bill has been annually passed; and each year the House has appropriated the entire sum asked for by the Pension Office. And on the passage of each bill there has never, as I believe, been a dissenting vote from any part of the country. And the bill now before the House, if the vote had been taken without debate, would have passed without opposition. And even after all the bitter abuse which has been causelessly, wantonly, wickedly, and falsely heaped on the Southern members in this debate, the bill will probably be passed by a unanimous vote.

How long shall we of the South be subject to this cruel injustice? And how much longer shall it be deemed necessary for us to bear it in humility and meekness in order to satisfy these falsifiers of fact and history that we are entitled to the respect due to American citizens and members of the American Congress?

But the gentleman from Iowa has told us that about sixty Southern members voted against the passage of the arrears-of-pension act, and that about an equal number voted against the bill which was passed some days ago to increase the pensions of widows from eight to twelve dollars per month.

While I have voted for all legitimate appropriations for pensions to the full amount of the Department estimates, I am proud to be classed with those who voted against the arrears-of-pension act. It was gotten up and reported to the House to secure the election of a very worthy man to the position of governor of Ohio, and when it was on its passage members of both political parties were urging their friends to vote for it, some of them saying that by doing so they would get ahead of their adversaries for the soldier vote, and that the Senate would defeat it if it should pass the House, showing the hope that it would not pass, but if it did that it was a struggle as to which party should pay the most money out of the public Treasury for votes and for political supremacy. And it was then alleged on this floor by members that it would not cost the Government more than $30,000,000. The first report which came to us from the Pension Office after it passed showed that it would cost the people $750,000,000.

I am also well satisfied with my vote against the bill recently passed to increase the pensions of widows from eight to twelve dollars per month.

First. Because, when money was not worth half as much as it is now, $8 was believed to be reasonable and just, and now, while hard times and a scarcity of money are felt everywhere, and when $8 will buy much more than at any other time during the last quarter of a century, while millions of the tax-payers of this country are suffering poverty and distress, I did not and do not believe it was or is right to increase their burdens by six or seven million dollars more a year, and God only knows how much more than this it will cost.

In the second place I voted against it because it is not a bill limited to the pensioning of those who were the wives of soldiers who fell in battle or who died of injuries received in the service at the time of the death or injury of such soldier, but because it would pension a woman born now, more than twenty years after the end of the war, if, when she grew to womanhood, she should marry a soldier receiving a pension; not pensioned because she suffered from the privations and calamities of war, but because ten, twenty, or thirty years after the war she chooses to marry one who was receiving the bounty of the Government. There is neither reason nor justice in a law that will lead to such a result, unless we mean to create a privileged class, who without reason or right are to be supported by the labor and taxes of others as poor and needy as themselves.

No attempts at intimidation such as we witness here shall induce me to vote for such an iniquity.

The real question about pensions now is not whether just and reasonable pensions shall be paid—for all parties from all parts of the country agree that this should be done—but it is whether we will follow the lead of men who propose extravagant and unreasonable pension laws, not as a means of justice, but for the selfish and unpatriotic purpose of buying votes and popularity among the soldier element, to be paid for by other people's toil and taxes.

The members from the South represent tax-payers and citizens entitled to receive justice at the hands of the Government just as all other Representatives do. And if through cowardly timidity we should vote to sacrifice their rights or consent by inaction to their sacrifice we would be unworthy the great trust they have reposed in us, and unworthy the position and character of Representatives in the American Congress.

While listening to some of the speeches made by members on this question I have wondered to myself what they expected of Southern members, and what character of men they wanted as their associates in this greatest popular legislative assembly in the world.

Would these gentlemen prefer to be associated here with a set of cowardly sneaks, without intelligence to understand the interests of their constituents and courage to represent them? Or would they not feel more comfortable in association with intelligent, self-respecting, manly, and courageous men, who understand and who faithfully perform their duties to their constituents and to the country? Do they suppose it to be better to have a degraded constituency and degraded Representatives rather than an intelligent and manly constituency, and honorable, intelligent Representatives?

What respect can we have for men who can afford to descend to appeals to the sectional prejudice and passion against us, and who try to foment these bad passions by making general charges against the Southern Representatives, "that they ought not to be here because they secured their election by shooting negroes, by fraud, and by ballot-box stuffing;" and who make these charges general against the whole South, but are careful to avoid mentioning time, place, or circumstances which would identify any act of wrong or enable us to disprove such charges? There is not a member of all those from the South who does not know these charges to be false. And the most humiliating fact to us in this connection is that such charges come, among others, from a member from the State of Ohio, and from the city of Cincinnati, where fraud in elections is the rule rather than the exception.

A few weeks ago I made some remarks on the subject of pensions. What I then said was republished in a number of Northern newspapers with expressions of approval. I read extracts from an article in the New York Post of January 29, commenting on what I then said:

> Yet, there is real danger that this piece of pure demagogy, which proposes to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars, may get through Congress. Senator SHERMAN himself, incredible as it seems, has announced his purpose to support now what he denounced and demonstrated to be a fraud only two years ago. Other Republican Senators and Representatives, who know the folly of the business as well as Mr. SHERMAN does, are ready to sanction it under the excuse that they are only living up to the platform of the last Republican national convention, which pledged the party to the repeal of the limitation clause. A good many Democrats share the belief of Republican politicians that it is good party policy to make such a bid for the "soldier vote."
> It would be an extraordinary sequel to the civil war if the residents of the victorious section should be indebted to the representatives of the conquered people for salvation from a financial calamity threatened in consequence of their victory. Yet it seems now possible that the tax-payers of the North may owe their preservation from this frightful burden to the Congressmen of the South—the "ex-rebels." There appears to be little doubt that a majority of the Northern Senators and Representatives are prepared to vote in favor of this outrageous proposition. If it is to be defeated, it must be defeated by Southern Senators and Representatives.
> It was long a stock plea for the retention of the Republican party in power that, if the Democrats came into control, they would bankrupt the national Treasury by voting pensions to rebel soldiers. The situation to-day is that the national Treasury is in danger of being bankrupted by reckless pension acts for Union soldiers, and that the main reliance of Republican tax-payers in the North for salvation from this peril is the opposition to such bills of the "confederate brigadiers." There has seldom been a better illustration of the irony of fate.

If time permitted, I would read from several other Northern papers, including the Chicago Herald, the Rock Islander, the Putnam Democrat, and others.

I have also received letters from citizens of nearly or quite all the Northern States, many of them from honorably discharged soldiers, approving what I then said, and if I had the authority of the writers I would be glad to read them.

At the time I made the remarks referred to a member from Kansas demanded to know of me if I could name one person on the pension-roll whose name ought not to be there. I remember seeing in the newspapers last fall that three or four hundred names were dropped from the pension-rolls in Philadelphia, and as many in Chicago, which were improperly on them. And a few days ago a citizen of Fitchburg, Mass., sent me the Boston Globe of February 15, which contains a list of the names of seventeen hundred and fifty-two persons just dropped from the rolls in that city because they were improperly on them. I will read the heading of this list to show why they were dropped, as follows:

> Before the last administration went out the Commissioner of Pensions began the work of comparing the rolls at the various pension agencies throughout the country with a view to dropping the names of those who had died, but who were still carried on the rolls, and also those whose right to a pension had ceased from other causes. When General Black became Commissioner of Pensions he continued that work, and as fast as the rolls of one agency were verified and corrected those of another were taken up. The larger the agency, and the greater the number of pensioners borne upon its rolls, the longer time was, of course, required for verification and correction, and so it happens that the rolls of the pension agency at Boston have just been completed. The names of seventeen hundred and fifty-two pensioners have been dropped at this agency, and the lists and the causes are as follows.

Gentlemen here may now censure and condemn some of us for our opposition to their reckless extravagance in the matter of pensions. But the tax-payers and toilers of all parts of the country will thank us for it; and I doubt not before many years those who go the furthest in this business now will be appealing to us or to our successors to save them and their people from the calamities likely to flow from the dangerous spirit of reckless and unjust spoliation of property-holders and laborers they are now encouraging.

I will make but one more observation, and that is to warn the gentlemen that they are teaching too many of our fellow-citizens that they ought to be be supported by the labor and property of other people, and teaching them to ask the Government to support them without the necessity of labor on their part, to warn them that they are adopting a course well calculated to destroy the sturdy and self-reliant manhood which has heretofore characterized American citizens, and to convert them into helpless dependents and mendicants. All history warns us against such a course, and history will approve the action of those who resist its adoption. We may too soon reach the point where such a policy will prove the destruction and overthrow of our beneficent institutions and of our great Republic.

Mr. CABELL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, it so happened that I served in the Forty-eighth Congress on the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. In that way I became pretty familiar with the operations of the Pension Office, especially under the ex-Commissioner of Pensions, Colonel Dudley. I am somewhat familiar at this time with the evidence taken by that committee. It was a most important investigation in more respects than one. It brought out the mode and method by which the pension-attorney's fee bill of July 4, 1884, became a law when pension attorneys, as if by the trick of a juggler, were enabled to take from the claimants millions of dollars.

I undertook in my feeble way at the last session to expose that transaction, and I have the satisfaction of having received the thanks of many soldiers, though the law still remains on the statute-books. I shall supplement that work by devoting a little time to the practical workings of the Pension Office itself. And I must be permitted to say that the full fruition of that work, to which the committee devoted a large part of the short session of the Forty-eighth Congress, has not been realized, and will not be, as long as one of the guilty and exposed rascals is allowed to stay in the service. But I am free to admit that I do not attach the blame to them that I do to their chief, who by his example, as I believe, demoralized the whole office; and I do not blame him so much as I do the political methods of the party to which he belonged—methods, it is true, which were the outgrowth of a long and uninterrupted lease of power extending through a demoralized and corrupted stage in the country's history.

And yet that examination is bearing its fruit. I venture the prediction that the gentleman from Iowa, if he remains in Congress for a decade, will not again do the country so great a service as when by his impetuous and injudicious attack on the present Commissioner of Pensions he invited public scrutiny into that office in the light of that investigation aided by subsequent developments. And what led to this attack? It was the following paragraph in the report of the present Commissioner of Pensions:

> At one time the Pension Office was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization, who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted. Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied, and the vast machinery of a professed governmental office became a party power. The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so not openly but surely. People of one faith filled every one of the great agencies. Examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party.

This is a strong statement. If it is true, its gravity will arrest the serious consideration of all good men. If it is not true, good men everywhere should rejoice in seeing the accusation disproved. Both the accused and the accuser were distinguished Union soldiers, disabled in the service, and of high standing in their respective political parties, and among their friends. But the character of neither should shield him from the responsibilities of the situation, or be permitted to overshadow the pertinent inquiry as to whether the beneficence of a great country, extended to those who suffered for its maintenance and preservation, has been cruelly made to depend upon the surrender of those very principles guaranteed to them by its organic law, namely, the right to vote as they pleased and as their judgment directed.

Now let us analyze and examine this charge:

> At one time the Pension Office was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization.

Is this true? It is said on the representation of the Commissioner of Pensions that of the sixteen hundred and sixty-six employés of that Bureau only twenty-eight were Democrats, and this fact is not denied. It is true, then, that the whole office was filled with the adherents of the Republican party. It is probable that but for the civil service the twenty-eight Democrats would have had no footing there.

But the charge continues:

> Who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted. Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied; and the vast machinery of a professed governmental office became a party power. The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so not openly, but surely. People of one faith filled every one of the great agencies.

Now let us look at the proofs. It stands admitted on the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions that of the twenty-two hundred examining surgeons less than one hundred were Democrats, perhaps not more than fifty. That, we think, practically disposes of that point, though the following letter read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] settles the policy of Colonel Dudley in the organization of these boards:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
> Washington, D. C., February 6, 1882.
> DOCTOR: Proposing to organize a board of examining surgeons in your city, I write to ask that you will give me a list of your most prominent physicians from which to make the selection.
> They should be Republican in politics.
> W. W. DUDLEY.

In support of the former part of the proposition I quote the testimony of witnesses to show the direct part taken by Colonel Dudley in the Pension Office in the matter of the campaign in General MATSON's district in Indiana. I here give the evidence of John M. Comstock, on pages 49 and 50 of the report:

> John M. Comstock sworn and examined.
> By the CHAIRMAN:
> Q. State your age, residence, and official position.
> A. I am forty years of age; my residence is Washington, D. C.; I am chief of the Western division of the Pension Office.
> Q. What State are you credited to?
> A. New York.
> Q. Did you hear the testimony given here yesterday relating to a Mr. Grubbs of Indiana?
> A. I did.
> Q. State to the committee what you know about Mr. Grubbs having the privilege of calling up cases on Congressional blanks and of having penalty envelopes sent to him, inside of others, just the same as they are sent to members of Congress.
> A. What I know in regard to that is that Mr. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions, told me that he was a friend of Mr. Grubbs; that there had been some calls made by Mr. Grubbs; that Mr. Grubbs was a candidate for Congress; and that he (Mr. Dudley) wished me, as a matter of courtesy, to see that these calls were answered. That was about all. I know nothing about penalty envelopes. He sent up Congressional slips.
> By Mr. ROGERS:
> Q. Who sent them up?
> A. Mr. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions. They did not come from Mr. Grubbs. Mr. Dudley said that he wanted I should give them attention. He said that Mr. Grubbs was a candidate for Congress from the State of Indiana and was a friend of his; and I considered this in the shape of an order.
> By the CHAIRMAN:
> Q. Did Mr. Dudley direct you to let Mr. Grubbs have penalty envelopes?
> A. No, sir; but I supposed that that followed. We treated him as a member of Congress.
> Q. That was your direction, to treat him as a member of Congress?
> A. Treat him with the same courtesy as a member of Congress. I do not remember having seen Mr. Grubbs up to that time.
> Q. Did you ever have any such order in respect to any other candidate for Congress?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Or any other pension attorney or private citizen?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. That was an exceptional case?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Who was Mr. Grubbs running against?
> A. I have learned that he was running against Mr. MATSON.
> Q. Did you know it at the time?
> A. No, sir; but I learned it soon afterward.
> Q. Did you, under those instructions, allow Mr. Grubbs to call up cases on Congressional blanks, and did you send out penalty envelopes to him in the same manner as to members of Congress?
> A. Certainly. I directed that Mr. Grubbs be treated exactly as a member of Congress. This was done by the directions of the Commissioner of Pensions and by no power of my own.
> Q. I assume that if you did it you did it under the directions of somebody, and that you were simply carrying out your instructions?
> A. Yes, sir; I carried out my instructions as well as I could in the ordinary way.

Now this witness is a Republican, and all vouch for his character. He came before the committee, not to turn State's evidence, but to defend his own conduct in this and other matters. He tells the simple story that the Commissioner himself told him, that Grubbs was a candidate for Congress, that he was his friend, and to treat him with the same courtesy as a member of Congress. He further says that this was the only case of the kind; that it was an exceptional case; that he understood this instruction to carry with it the use of the penalty envelope by Mr. Grubbs, which was a clear violation of the law. On page 51 of the report, the witness says:

> John M. Comstock sworn and examined.
> * * * * * *
> By the CHAIRMAN:
> Q. When was it that Mr. Dudley gave you these instructions?
> A. It is impossible for me to state.
> Q. State about the time.
> A. I can not do so with any kind of exactness.
> Q. Was it before Mr. Dudley went to Ohio?
> A. Yes. As Mr. Clarke was the acting Commissioner in September, I think it was in the latter part of August.
> Q. It was before Mr. Clarke became the acting Commissioner?
> A. Yes; I think it was in the summer.
> Q. It was before the time that Mr. Clarke assumed the duties of Commissione of Pensions?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Do you know whether it was with Mr. Clarke's knowledge or not?
> A. I can not say.

So that it appears that this interference in politics by the Commissioner was in August, and while he was actually the Commissioner and acting as such. That much is clear; who will deny it?

It is due Colonel Dudley to say that he denies having said what Comstock said he did, but he in the same breath tells us Comstock is a man of veracity. Colonel Dudley, however, admits that he was favoring Mr. Grubbs, and that it was a favor he had never extended to any one else. I quote his evidence, pages 263 and 264:

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Did I understand you to say that Comstock did not testify that you authorized him to send penalty envelopes to Mr. Grubbs?
A. If he did, I have misread his testimony. I did not so understand his testimony.
Q. Did you not understand him to testify that you instructed him to extend the same courtesies to Mr. Grubbs as he did to other members of Congress?
A. I do not recollect that he used that language.
Q. If he did so, is it untrue?
A. What I did say to him I have testified.
Q. If Mr. Comstock said so, is that untrue?
A. Mr. Comstock is a man of truth and veracity, and if he were led into making such a remark as that, it is a mistake.
Q. I do not mean to ask you whether it was willfully false, but I ask you whether it is untrue. I want to understand what you did say to Mr. Comstock.
A. I do not say that I can give the exact language which I used, but I told Mr. Comstock that he should answer Mr. Grubbs's inquiries. I also yesterday gave the reason why.
Q. Did you not tell Mr. Comstock to treat Mr. Grubbs substantially as other members of Congress were treated?
A. In that regard to the extent I speak of.
Q. What I want to know is whether or not you directed Mr. Comstock to extend the ordinary courtesies due to members of Congress to Mr. Grubbs, of Indiana, touching the calling up of pension claims in the office during that campaign?
A. I do not think I made use of that language.
Q. State what you did say.
A. As nearly as I can recollect I told Mr. Comstock that he should answer Mr. Grubbs's inquiries as promptly as possible; and that, in doing so, he should say to the claimant that the answer was sent in reply to an inquiry from Mr. Grubbs.
Q. Is that the whole of it?
A. That is the extent of my instructions.
Q. Were you aware that under those instructions Mr. Comstock was extending the ordinary Crongressional favors to Mr. Grubbs?
A. No, sir; I learned it for the first time in this testimony.
Q. Did you ever give an order of the same sort touching any other member of Congress?
A. I do not think I did, but I should have done so if I had been asked.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever give such an order to a Democratic candidate for Congress?
A. I would have done so if he had asked it. I should not have thought it a very great thing if I had done so.
Q. State what work you were engaged in before you were appointed Commissioner of Pensions.
A. I was United States marshal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when Colonel Dudley testified that if a Democrat had asked this favor he would have granted it, I was made sad by the realization of "how many good things we miss in this world by not asking for them." Colonel Dudley helping to elect a Democratic Congressman would no doubt amuse his genial and facile preceptor in politics, the ex-Senator from Arkansas, Stephen W. Dorsey.

But I want to show the effect of this misconduct of Colonel Dudley. I quote from the evidence of T. A. Broadus, a clerk in the Pension Office, page 24 of the report.

T. A. Broadus recalled.

By the CHAIRMAN.

Q. Do you know, or did you learn from what took place in the Pension Office, the name of the candidate who was running against Mr. MATSON in Indiana?
A. A man named Grubbs, I think.
Q. How did you learn that fact?
A. Some Indiana case from that district was called up by some man named Grubbs, and we wrote what we called "Congressionals"—that is, letters to members of Congress in reply.
Q. Do you know whether Mr. Grubbs was allowed to use the Congressional blanks for calling up cases the same as if he were a member of Congress?
A. I think some calls have come to my desk on Congressional blanks with Mr. Grubbs's name on them.
Q. Do you know whether Mr. Grubbs was allowed official envelopes in which to return replies to claimants, the same as Mr. MATSON or any other member of Congress?
A. Yes, sir; my recollection is that we treated Mr. Grubbs just as if he had been a member of Congress; that is, we inclosed to him a reply directed to the claimant in an official penalty envelope.
Q. Did you know that Mr. Grubbs was a Republican candidate for Congress?
A. I do not know that it was told me at the time. I rather believe that he was, but I have no official information on the subject.
Q. Do you know of any other gentleman but Mr. Grubbs calling up cases on Congressional blanks and being furnished with official envelopes for replies, except Congressmen?
A. No, sir.
Q. You do not know of any Congressional blanks or official envelopes being sent to any Democratic candidate for Congress, do you?
A. No, sir; I had no instructions as to Mr. Grubbs's politics.
Q. But still you know that he was a candidate for Congress, did you?
A. Yes.

Now I quote from the evidence of Louis J. Harbaugh, another clerk, page 29 of the report:

By Mr. HART:

Q. If I understand you rightly, in sending a communication to Mr. Grubbs, or to any private citizen, the Pension Office would use an official envelope?
A. Yes; in writing to a private citizen the office uses one official envelope.
Q. It would send its communication in an official envelope?
The WITNESS. To whom?
Mr. HART. To the man that the Pension Office was writing to.
The WITNESS. Yes.
Q. Suppose that the Pension Office should have occasion, instead of writing to the attorney of a claimant, to write directly to the claimant himself, what kind of an envelope would be then used?
A. The regulation penalty envelope.
Q. So that the result of sending a communication to Mr. Grubbs in an official envelope, and inclosing an official envelope directed to the claimant, would be precisely the same as if the office had written to Mr. Grubbs and had also written to the claimant, would it not?
A. That depends upon the cause that gives rise to the communication.
Q. Does the Pension Office send any communications to soldiers or claimants that are not in official envelopes?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. You direct an envelope to Mr. Grubbs (he being a private citizen) and that communication goes in an official envelope. If you had occasion to direct an envelope to claimant you would do the same thing; and the complaint which you make is that the office directed an official envelope to go from Grubbs to the claimant?
A. You state it correctly.
Q. You said something a while ago as to an effort being made, or something being done, by Mr. Dudley or some officer in the Pension Office to help to have somebody elected in Indiana; be so good as to repeat it.
A. I stated that when I received this communication from the Hon. G. W. Grubbs I did not know him, and I went to our letter critic, to whom we go with our letters (Mr. Story), and I asked him about it; he said that the Hon. G. W. Grubbs was to be treated just the same as if he was already elected a Congressman; that was prior to the election; subsequently to the election I had another communication to address to the Hon. G. W. Grubbs, and I wrote it just the same as I had done previous to the election, treating him as a Congressman; my letter was sent back by Mr. Story disapproved; I went to see Mr. Story about it, and he said, "Grubbs is not a Congressman any more; do not treat him as a Congressman any more, but as a private citizen; write the letter directed to the claimant in care of "G. W. Grubbs." I said to Mr. Story, "Why is this thusly?" or some such remark, and he said, "Well, Mr. Grubbs was running for Congress out in Indiana against Matson; Grubbs was a friend of Mr. Dudley's and Mr. Dudley was trying to have him elected, but he did not get elected."

Now, if the knowledge of this misconduct, this clear and distinct violation of law, had been confined to Colonel Dudley and to the chief, Mr. Comstock, the effect would not have been so demoralizing. But this could not be. The very organization of the office put the information, as it appears, in the possession of various clerks; they knew then that their chief was using the office for political purposes. They knew it as early as August; and if he could so far depart from public duty, what was to be expected of those under him who wanted to win his favor and promote his desires?

But I must be pardoned for this short digression. I return to the subject, namely, to show that this office was engaged in politics and had other tests than those known to the law as a condition to granting pensions.

I take first the case of Thomas F. Winthrop, who was a special examiner in Ohio, at the October election. I propose to show that by preconcerted arrangement he was at or near the polls on election day, ostensibly to take proof, but really to control votes for Mr. Taylor, the Republican candidate for Congress against my friend General WARNER. Not only that, but that he visited on that day three distinct precincts; and finally made false returns to the Pension Office, returns that he knew were false and criminal, and so admitted under oath. I quote first from the evidence of George Starkey, pp. 5, 6, and 7 of the report:

George Starkey sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you know the number of your claim?
A. I do.
Q. What is it?
A. No. 279773.
Q. Has the claim been allowed?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Who is your attorney?
A. A. R. T. & A. P. Lacey, of Washington, D. C.
Q. Have you had a special examination in your case?
A. Yes.
Q. When did that take place?
A. Mr. Winthrop came out on the 11th of October, 1884,
Q. Who is Mr. Winthrop?
A. He is a special examiner of pensions.
Q. He came to your place, you say, on the 11th of October?
A. Yes.
Q. State what took place.
A. He came to my house and took three affidavits from me in my pension case.
Q. Did he make any arrangement for a further examination?
A. Yes; he told me he would be back on the 14th (the day of the election), and I was to meet him at Lawrence town-house on the 14th, about 10 o'clock. I said that I would meet him there.
Q. The 14th was the day of the State election, was it?
A. Yes.
Q. Was the town-house, where you were to meet him, the place of voting?
A. Yes.
Q. Did he leave any word with you to notify anybody else to be there?
A. Yes; he told me to notify George Forshey.
Q. He was to be there also?
A. Yes.
Q. Did he come there on that occasion?
A. Yes.
Q. Lawrence town-house was the place of voting in that precinct, was it?
A. Yes.
Q. And he came on the day of election?
A. Yes.
Q. State what took place on that occasion. What did Mr. Winthrop do, and what was said by him or in his presence?
A. Mr. Winthrop took me down to Mr. Barton's house, which is close to the town-house.
Q. Who is Mr. Barton?
A. He is a Republican.
Q. Where does he live?
A. About 200 yards below the town-house.
Q. What is the town-house?

A. A place for voting and for their township meetings.
Q. Go on and state what Mr. Winthrop did.
A. I went to Barton's house with him, myself, and George Forshey, Elias Forshey, his brother. We all went down together with Mr. Winthrop. I was there a little while and then he sent me after George Sutton to come down.
Q. Who is George Sutton?
A. He is a Democrat.
Q. Who is George Forshey?
A. He is a Democrat too; and Elias Forshey, his brother, is also a Democrat. I asked Mr. Barton whether he would fill me out an affidavit. He said he was a friend of the soldier, and all that.
Q. Did he take any part in the conversation?
A. He came in and slapped George Forshey on the leg in this way [indicating] and said, "You have always been a Democrat, and I am very glad to hear that you are going to vote the Republican ticket." That was right in Barton's house.
Q. What was going on at that time in the house, and what was Mr. Winthrop doing?
A. He was taking affidavits.
Q. He was present in the house taking affidavits?
A. Yes.
Q. Did Mr. Winthrop himself give you any advice there or elsewhere?
A. We went there between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning, and he kept us until 4 o'clock, when we started to go to the town-house. He was going up to the stable to get his horse. On the way he said, "Boys, Taylor is the man to vote for, if you ever want to get your pensions." That is all he said.
Q. Did he tell you when he thought you would get your pension if you so voted?
A. He told me he thought I would get it in about three weeks; and it is pretty nearly three months ago, and I have not heard from it yet.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Would you have voted the Republican ticket at all that day if it had not been for this pension matter?
A. No, sir; I would not.
Q. You voted the Republican ticket because you thought, from the representations made to you by Barton and Winthrop, that you would get your pension if you did so?
A. Yes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many votes do you think were controlled at that voting precinct by what was said there by Mr. Winthrop and Mr. Barton?
A. There were several; twelve or fifteen I reckon, and may be more.
Q. You yourself ordinarily take quite an active part in politics, do you not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. This appointment, I understand, was made with you by Mr. Winthrop to be there on election day, the 14th of October?
A. Yes.
A. Did Mr. Winthrop take any affidavits there on the 13th of October, the day before the election?
A. No, sir; he did not.

So they captured Starkey's vote, that of his son, and he thinks not less than ten or fifteen others, and Starkey being a prominent Democrat and an active worker they kept him from the polls also. That was a good day's work for one examiner. I now quote from the evidence of George Forshey, pages 7, 8, 9, of the report:

George Forshey sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age, residence, and occupation.—A. I am past fifty-three years of age; I reside in Lawrence Township, Washington County, Ohio; and am a farmer by occupation.
Q. Were you in the military service during the war?—A. Yes.
Q. In what company and regiment?—A. Company K, Sixty-second Ohio.
Q. The same company that Mr. Starkey was in?—A. Yes.
Q. In what army were you?
A. In the Eastern army.
Q. When did you enlist?
A. I enlisted on the 11th of November, 1861, and was discharged on the 18th of March, 1863.
Q. Were you an applicant for a pension?
A. Yes.
Q. When did you make your application?
A. I made my application either in 1878 or 1879; I can't tell exactly which.
Q. What is the number of your claim?
A. The number of my pension certificate is 141507; I am drawing $2 a month.
Q. Have you made an application for an increase?
A. Yes.
Q. Has the increase been allowed?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. Your case is pending, is it?
A. Yes.
Q. Is your pension claim under special examination?
A. Yes.
Q. State where you were on the 11th of October last.
A. If my memory serves me right, I must have been about home on the 11th of October, in Lawrence Township, Washington County, Ohio.
Q. Did you make any affidavit in your pension case on that day?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you on the 13th?
A. No, sir.
Q. Where were you on the 14th of October?
A. I was at the town-house of Lawrence Township.
Q. Was that the day of election?
A. That was the day of election.
Q. And the town-house was the place of election?
A. Yes; it was the polling-place.
Q. Did you see Mr. Winthrop on that day?
A. I did.
Q. State where you saw him.
A. I saw him at Mr. Barton's.
Q. Who were present?
A. Mr. Starkey, Mr. Barton, Elias Forshey, and George W. Sutton, I think, and David Martin.
Q. How did you happen to go there?
A. I was invited by Mr. Starkey. He left word for me to be there to give testimony in the case of Mr. Starkey, and to have testimony taken in my own case, so that on the 14th we met there precisely at the hour he invited me to be there.
Q. That was on election day?
A. That was on election day.
Q. State what took place.
A. There was a good deal of talk and electioneering going on there between Mr. Barton and several other organs or politicians of the precinct. We asked Mr. Barton to fill out our affidavits. He said he would providing we would vote his ticket.
Q. What was his ticket?
A. The Republican ticket. He did not like to take our words for it, and accompanied us to the polls and saw us put our votes in.
Q. What are your politics?
A. I am a Democrat.
Q. Have you always voted the Democratic ticket?
A. I always voted the Democratic ticket.
Q. Which of those gentlemen whom you have named were Republicans?
A. David Martin and Norriston Barton were the organs of the Republican party at that precinct to make themselves useful.
Q. State anything further that you heard said in the house at that time.
A. I believe that was all that was said in the house. After we got through there and started up to the polls, Mr. Winthrop spoke on the way of the good qualities of Mr. Taylor, of his soldiership, and of how he sympathized with the soldiers, and to give poor crippled men pensions. He said that Taylor was undoubtedly the man to support, for he knew how to sympathize with the soldier. He said also that you [Mr. WARNER] were not the man. I believe, if my memory serves me right, that he spoke of a bill entitled the Mexican pension bill. I think he spoke of that.
Q. State whether you were led to believe from what took place there that, in order to secure the allowance of your claim, it was better for you to vote the Republican ticket.
A. Yes, I thought the thing looked squally in the way it was, and that is what led me to vote the Republican ticket.
Q. Have you sons who are voters?
A. Yes, I have three sons voters. The third of them gave his first vote that day. I have also a son-in-law who is a voter.
Q. Do you know how they voted?
A. I suppose they voted the way the old man went.
Q. You think that they were led to believe that it was for the interest of the old man to vote in that way?
A. I believe so.
Q. How do you know how they voted?
A. They said that they would vote in that way.
Q. How did you vote in the November election?
A. I voted for Cleveland.

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Did you tell your sons before they voted how you were going to vote?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you see them vote?
A. No, I do not know that I did.
Q. How had they voted before?
A. They had always voted the Democratic ticket.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Mr. Winthrop go to the polls with you on that day?
A. He went up there as we went up and he stopped right below the crossing place, where we had to cross over a little bridge to go the polls.
Q. He went along with you, did he?
A. Yes; he walked along a piece with me. He was talking and throwing his discourse at me.
Q. Coming back to the gathering in Barton's house, what was said to you there by any of those present?
A. Mr. Martin, to confirm the thing so that it would look pretty strong, came to the house while I was there. He slapped me on the leg in this way [indicating] and said, "You have always been a Democrat." Then he cast his eye toward the special examiner and said, "but I am glad to know to-day that you are going to vote the Republican ticket."
Q. Did Mr. Barton make the affidavit that he proposed to make for you?
A. No; he did not make any affidavit for me.
Q. Did he make any affidavit there for Starkey?
A. Yes; he made an affidavit there for Starkey.

These are ex-soldiers, and Ohio farmers. They came before the committee, under subpœnas, from their distant homes, and I bear testimony to their honorable bearing and decent deportment. I want to give this man Winthrop a fair show, and I quote from his evidence, pages 12, 14, 15, and 16 of the report:

Thomas F. Winthrop sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State your age and position.
A. I am forty-two years of age; I am special examiner in the United States Pension Bureau.
Q. State where you are located.
A. My headquarters are at Marietta, Ohio.
Q. What counties are embraced in your district?
A. When I was originally assigned to the district it embraced the counties of Belmont, Guernsey, Noble, Monroe, and Washington, with headquarters at Marietta.
Q. Do you know whether any other special examiners are at work or have been at work in the same district?
A. I do.
Q. State how many special examiners were at work in that district during the months of September, October, and November, 1884.
A. I think Mr. Galloway was assigned to that district, with headquarters at Cambridge, in Guernsey County.
Q. Any others?
A. Yes; Mr. Bunyea, with headquarters at Woodsfield, Monroe County.
Q. Any others?
A. Mr. Evans, I believe, was in Belmont County. I never met him, but understood he was there.
Q. Are those all the special examiners you know of who were in that district?
A. No, sir.
Q. Who else?
A. Mr. Stanton, with headquarters in Marietta. Mr. Roush was there for a short time during the time named, and so was Mr. Carr. Mr. Carr and Mr. Roush were only there temporarily to examine a few cases.
Q. Are those special examiners all in that district now?
A. No, sir; I think not. Mr. Roush and Mr. Carr were from adjoining districts and were there but temporarily; they examined, I think, four or five cases each.
Q. Are the other examiners all under you?
A. No, sir; they are independent of me entirely.
Q. They were simply assigned to work in that district?
A. Yes.
Q. Where were you during the months of August, September, October, and November of last year?
A. At various places in the district. My headquarters were at Marietta.

Q. And you were at work, were you, in the district that you have named?
A. I was.
Q. Where were you about the middle of October last?
A. I do not know that I can state precisely.
Q. Can you state where you were on the 11th, 13th, and 14th of October, 1884?
A. I do not know that I can state where I was on the 11th. I think I can say as to the day of the election and the day preceding the election.
Q. Look at these papers [handing papers to the witness] and say whether you recognize them as your own daily reports.
A. (After examining the papers.) I do.
Q. As special examiner, you are required, are you not, to make daily reports to the Commissioner of Pensions?
A. I am.
Q. Look over this bundle of daily reports and say whether they are your reports for the month of October.
A. (After examining them.) They are.
Q. These three [exhibiting] are your daily reports for the 11th, 13th, and 14th of October?
A. They are.
The reports were put in evidence, and are as follows:

* * * * * * *

Q. State where you were on the 11th of October [handing the daily report of that day to the witness].
A. In Marietta and Lawrence Township.
Q. How far is Lawrence Township from Marietta?
A. The line is about 7 miles, I think.
Q. In what part of Lawrence Township were you on the 11th?
A. I do not recollect exactly. (Looking at the report.) This report shows that I was in Marietta and Lawrence Township; but I can not tell the exact locality in that township where I was.
Q. Where were you on the 13th?
A. (Referring to the daily report of that date.) In Lawrence Township. I drove out there again from Marietta to Lawrence.
Q. You report that you took three affidavits there on the 13th?
A. Yes.
Q. State whose affidavits you took on that day.
A. I can not state.
Q. What case were you examining?
A. It seems that it was the case of George Starkey.
Q. Take the papers in that case, No. 279773 [handing them to the witness], and state what affidavits you took on the 13th.
A. (After examining the papers.) I seem to have taken the affidavits of Mr. Sutton, Dr. Ulmann, and George Forshey.
Q. Can you tell at what house you were when you took those depositions on the 13th of October?
A. I think I took Dr. Ulmann's at his own house, near Cow Run.
Q. At what house did you take the deposition of George Forshey?
A. I do not recollect.
Q. What day of the week was the 13th?
A. The 13th was Monday, I think; Tuesday was election day.
Q. You do not recollect what house you were at when you took Mr. Forshey's deposition?
A. No, sir; I do not.
Q. Are you sure that you took Mr. Forshey's deposition on the 13th of October? What does the affidavit show? [Handing it to the witness.]
A. I have looked at this affidavit, and it gives the date as the 13th.
Q. Did you take George Forshey's deposition on the 13th?
A. I can not say as to Mr. Forshey. I do not recollect when I did take it.
Q. You have reported that you took it on the 13th, have you not?
A. Yes; my report shows that.
Q. And your daily report for that day shows that you took three affidavits on that day, does it not?
A. Yes.
Q. If you took Mr. Forshey's affidavit you took it at some house, did you not?
A. Yes; I remember that I took Mr. Sutton's affidavit at Mr. Barton's house.
Q. Did you take Mr. Sutton's at Mr. Barton's on the 13th?
A. No; I think that the date is wrong.
Q. Were you at Mr. Barton's at all on the 13th?
A. I do not think I was; I was in the township but I do not think I went up as far as Mr. Barton's house.
Q. Did you take Mr. Sutton's deposition on the 13th at all?
A. I think I took Mr. Sutton's deposition on the 14th.
Q. When did you take Mr. George Forshey's deposition?
A. I am not sure about that.
Q. Look at it [handing the affidavit to the witness]. Is this George Forshey's affidavit?
A. Yes.
Q. Is that George Forshey's signature to it?
A. Yes; I think it is.
Q. You state in it, "Sworn to and subscribed before me this 13th day of October, 1884, and I certify that the contents were fully made known to deponent before signing it."
A. Yes.
Q. That is your signature, is it?
A. Yes; that is my signature.
Q. You have reported that affidavit as having been taken on the 13th?
A. Yes.
Q. But you say now that it was not taken on the 13th?
A. I did not say so with reference to Mr. Forshey's affidavit. I say it with reference to Mr. Sutton's.
Q. At what house did you take this affidavit of George Forshey's?
A. I have taken Mr. Forshey's affidavit in a number of claims that he has.
Q. But this is an affidavit in the claim of Mr. Starkey, is it not?
A. Yes.
Q. At what house did you take this affidavit?
A. I think it was taken at Mr. Barton's.
Q. Were you or were you not at Mr. Barton's on the 13th of October, the day on which the affidavit purports to have been taken?
A. No, sir; I was not.
Q. Then you did not take this affidavit on the day on which you reported that you took it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were you in Lawrence at all on the 13th?
A. I was.
Q. While you were in Lawrence Township on the 11th of October, did you make arrangements to be there again on the 14th?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. With whom did you make arrangements to be there on the 14th?
A. With Mr. Starkey.
Q. With anybody else?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. At what place in the township did you arrange to be on that day?
A. It was understood that I should go to Mr. Barton's.
Q. And you went to Mr. Barton's, did you?
A. Yes.
Q. What day was the 14th of October?
A. It was the day of the State election in Ohio.
Q. Whom did you meet at Mr. Barton's house?
A. I think I met the claimant, Mr. Forshey.
Q. Who else?
A. I saw Mr. Barton there.
Q. Who else?
The WITNESS. Do you wish me to state all the persons that I met there?
The CHAIRMAN. Yes; state all the persons whom you met there on that day, whose depositions you took, and what took place at that house.
A. I met Mr. George Forshey there, Mr. G. W. Sutton, and Mr. Elias Forshey; I do not recollect meeting any others at the house.
Q. Go on and state what took place.
A. I was there at the request of Mr. Starkey, to take evidence in his pension claim.
Q. Whose affidavits did you take there in the Starkey case?
A. I took Mr. Barton's evidence, and Mr. Sutton's, and Mr. Elias Forshey's; I do not recollect any others now.
The CHAIRMAN. This [handing a paper to the witness] is your daily report of the 14th of October. You can use it to refresh your memory.
The WITNESS. This does not give the names of the persons whose affidavits I took, only the number.
Q. State what else took place there on that occasion.
A. I have no knowledge of anything taking place except my taking the depositions; these parties coming in to see me and giving me their statements.
Q. That is all that you recollect having taken place there, is it?
A. Yes.
Q. Do your reports of the 13th and 14th of October show that three depositions were taken on each of those days?
A. They do.
Q. But you state now that those daily reports are not true, and that you did not take three affidavits on each of those days.
A. In two instances they were not true.
C. State whether the deposition which you have signed does not show upon its face that it was taken on the 13th.
A. Yes.
Q. But you state now that it was taken on the 14th?
A. Yes.
Q. As special examiner, do you draw mileage for the distance you travel?
A. No, sir. We have our expenses paid; that is all.
Q. I see you have reported 13 miles to Moss Run; is that correct?
A. That is correct. I do not always go in a direct line to these places. Very frequently I have to go off from the road.
Q. Look at this sheet of your report and state how you have reported Forshey and Starkey and Barton as to credibility.
A. I have reported the claimant, Mr. Starkey, as fair; Mr. Barton as good, and Mr. George Forshey as good. It is my duty to ascertain the credibility of witnesses.

By Mr. WHITING:

Q. What explanation have you to give of the fact that you reported to the Pension Office that you had taken three affidavits on the 13th, whereas now you state that you took no affidavits on that day?
A. I did not state so. I stated that two of those affidavits which are dated on the 13th were taken on the 14th. My only explanation is this: We are expected to do a certain amount of work. I went out on the 13th, but was not fortunate in finding some witnesses whom I went to see, and I took but one affidavit on that day. I made my report the next day, when I had taken five affidavits, and so I divided them between the two days. Of course I have committed a technical, and, perhaps, a criminal error in that.
Q. Did you urge any of those parties, either Starkey or Forshey, to vote for Mr. Taylor?
A. No, sir; I did not.
Q. Did you ask Mr. Barton to encourage them to vote for Taylor?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you have any understanding with him about that?
A. No, sir; I say most emphatically that I have never used my position for political purposes.

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. I understand from you now that the reason why you dated these affidavits on the 13th which you took on the 14th was so as to cover an extra day. Is that true?
A. I desired to make a good report for both days. That was the idea.
Q. In other words, you wanted it to appear to the Pension Office here that you were active and doing good work.
A. That was the idea.
Q. And so you distributed the affidavits to cover both days?
A. Yes.
Q. While, in point of fact, they were not taken on those days?
A. That is very true.
Q. Is there not a general order in the Pension Office that examiners must be prepared to swear to the facts which they report?
A. Yes.
Q. You knew, therefore, did you not, that this was wrong?
A. I did.
Q. While you were at Lawrence Township on the 14th, state whether or not there was a general conversation between the parties who were there (and in your presence) while these affidavits were being taken, encouraging those persons whose cases you were examining to vote the Republican ticket on that day.
A. No, sir; I do not think I heard anything of the kind.
Q. Did you not yourself, when you got through with the affidavits, and when you were walking along with your buggy, in company with one of these gentlemen, say to him that Mr. Taylor was the proper man to vote for?
A. No, sir.
Q. You did not make any such statement?
A. No, sir.
Q. And no such statement as that was made in your presence on that day?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. Do you say that it was not?
A. I can say that I did not hear anything of the kind.
Q. Were you at three separate and distinct voting places on that day?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you not leave Marietta in the morning?
A. I left Marietta very early in the morning.
Q. Then you went to Lawrence Township?
A. Yes.
Q. And then you went to Cow Run that evening?
A. I drove around by Cow Run.
Q. Then you were at three separate and distinct voting places on that day?
A. I passed them. That is just as near as I was to voting places. I did not get out of my buggy at any of the voting places.
Q. Did you not get out to take affidavits in Lawrence Township?
A. That was away from the polls.
Q. How far from the polls?

A. Possibly a quarter of a mile or an eighth of a mile. It was some little distance from the polling place. I did not stop there.

Q. You did not stop at Lawrence Township?

A. I did not stop at the polls.

Q. Did you not stop in your buggy and inquire for certain parties and get them, and then go to Barton's house?

A. I got out of my buggy some distance below the polling place and walked down to the house.

Q. To what house?

A. To Mr. Barton's house.

Q. Did you get out of your buggy at the polls?

A. I got out at some little distance from the polls.

Q. What do you call some little distance?

A. About a hundred yards.

Q. You made inquiry at the polls for those parties whom you wanted?

A. No, sir. It was understood that I should go to Mr. Barton's house and take affidavits.

Q. You had required them to meet you at Barton's?

A. Yes.

Q. Whom had you required to meet you there?

A. I had simply made an appointment with Mr. Starkey, the claimant, and he was to arrange to have his witnesses there.

Q. Through whom did you notify Mr. Starkey?

A. I had seen him some days prior to that and had taken his statement and commenced his case, and he suggested that the 14th would be a good day for him to go to Lawrence town-house with his witnesses.

Q. It turns out that you were tolerably active on the 14th of October; you managed to get to three voting places on the one day and to take a good many affidavits.

A. It is hardly fair to say that.

Q. It is true, is it not?

A. I can not say that it is.

Q. You say that you left Marietta in the morning and then went to Lawrence town-house and then to Cow Run?

A. I was at three places.

Q. So you made the round trip and took in three of them in one day?

A. Yes.

It will be seen that he admits everything except that he undertook to influence these men to vote the Republican ticket. He even admits that his report was false, and says he made it false in order to have it appear at the office that he was doing good work. He admits these pension claimants were men of good character. He might as well have admitted it all, for he admitted enough to discredit himself.

Now, here are two cases in one day in which party politics was made the test for getting a pension—two cases controlled by one examiner—and through these two claimants at least 10 or 15 votes were manipulated at one precinct; and it must be remembered that this examiner visited three precincts that day. He knew, the whole country knew, for the press was teeming with it, that his chief, Colonel Dudley, was in command that day; and Colonel Dudley knew where his captains were, and what it took to carry Ohio in an October election. Then were there no tests other than the law and service in the field to which claimants had to submit to get their pensions? But let us proceed another step.

Where was the great mass of these examiners in October and November, 1884? This evidence shows that they were concentrated where they could "do the most good." They were in the close districts. In the State of Ohio alone there were sixty-seven on leave, and in Indiana there were thirty-nine. I publish their names as they appear on page 134 of the report, the information having been furnished us by the Pension Office:

But I propose to place these facts upon record, so that those who come after us may see how the Pension Office was used at that time. I refer to pages——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman incorporate into his remarks the evidence to which he refers?

Mr. ROGERS. With great pleasure, if the House will permit it; and I shall ask leave to do so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have no doubt the House will grant leave.

Mr. ROGERS. I will give instances from one or two districts to show how the Pension Office was operated during those periods. First, take the Columbus district of Ohio. The testimony shows that during January, February, and March the examiners in that district were ten; and during the months of September, October, and November, when the elections were on hand, they ranged from twenty to twenty-one. Take the Cleveland district of Ohio. During the months of January, February, and March, as the record shows, there were in that district from six to nine examiners; but from July to December the number ranged from eighteen to twenty-four. Take the Indianapolis district, and I have heard it said on this floor—not publicly—that there has not been an honest election held in the city of Indianapolis since the war. Whether that is true or not, I do not know, and I do not pretend to say.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I presume it is correct. The Democrats have been carrying that city of late.

Mr. ROGERS. Cincinnati too, it seems; so that the methods which were employed under reconstruction in order to control, humiliate, and subjugate the South have returned to plague their inventors. In the Indianapolis district during the months of January, February, and March the number of special examiners ranged from eleven to fourteen, and during the months of September, October, November, and December the number was twenty-four each month.

Now, these are but samples. If the House will permit me, I will print the whole record on this point; and I want some gentleman to explain why it is that it took twenty-four examiners in that district in October, November, and December, and only eleven to fourteen in the months of January, February, and March. I would like gentlemen also to make an explanation with reference to these other districts that I have referred to.

But, to be more specific, I publish a few sample districts as found on pages 146 and 147 of the report, showing the "number of special examiners in each district for each calendar month of the year 1884."

Now, contrast these districts with others when there was no political struggle on hand and it will be found that the force was about the same throughout the year. In the Philadelphia district there were more examiners in January than in November, in the Pittsburgh district there was but little change throughout the year, and so on.

What explanation can be offered for this thing except politics—politics in the office and politics in the field?

I can not dwell longer on this point. The secret of this business is better understood when we consider the conduct of the chief of this division, Mr. Rathbone, and his relations to the Commissioner, Colonel Dudley. In the first place, he was selected and put at the head of this division by Mr. Dudley, this being, perhaps, the most important division in the office. When he was appointed he had, perhaps, never gone through a pension claim in his life. He had been an employé in the Treasury Department, but Colonel Dudley knew him and knew his value. I want to show from Mr. Rathbone's own evidence his relations with Mr. Dudley. They say these people were not "trained in unscrupulous schools." Let us see. I quote from the evidence, page 213. I cross-examined him myself. I read:

(E. G. Rathbone's testimony, pp. 213 and 214 of the report.)

Q. At all events you did not pay your expenses there (to Cincinnati) and back?

A. No, sir.

Q. Be good enough to state to the committee how it happened that you were transferred from the Treasury Department and put in your present position. By what influence or by what arrangement was that done originally?

A. Mr. Dudley asked me to take the position.

Q. What office did you hold at the time you were transferred to the Pension Office and put in charge of the special examiners' division?

A. I was in the Treasury service.

Q. And you were transferred from that service to the Pension Office and made chief of that division?

A. No, sir; I resigned my position as agent of the Treasury Department to accept the position of chief of the special examination division. I did it at Mr. Dudley's request, not only personally, but by various telegrams. He sent a man to Indiana to ask me to take that place, and he labored with me three days before I would accept it. Finally I accepted it, came on to Washington, resigned my position in the Treasury, and took the place of chief of the special examination division.

Q. Had you not been engaged in political work prior to that time with Mr. Dudley?

A. I was in the State of Indiana when Mr. Dudley was marshal there during the 1880 campaign.

Q. You co-operated with him in that campaign?

A. Not any more with him than I did with Mr. New, chairman of the Republican central committee, and a member of the National Republican committee, and with several other gentlemen.

Q. Including Mr. Dorsey?

A. Mr. Dorsey was there.

Q. Mr. Dudley knew your efficiency pretty well in that line, did he not?

A. I can not tell you that.

Q. You claim to be tolerably efficient in that line of work?

A. I have made no claim in that direction.

Q. What do you say about it now as a matter of fact?

A. I would rather you would not try to prove that by me. It is rather a delicate matter for me to touch upon. I might overestimate myself or I might underestimate myself.

Mr. ROGERS. You do not seem to have any extraordinary amount of delicacy when you are talking about your official duties here.

The WITNESS. You ask me here what I think of my capabilities as a politician.

Mr. ROGERS. As a political worker.

The WITNESS. I submit to you that that is not exactly a right course of questioning.

Mr. ROGERS. I think you are probably correct, and I withdraw my question on account of your extreme modesty on that proposition.

I think it will be admitted, after the Indiana campaign in 1880, that Dorsey was not an overscrupulous political school teacher, and I think General Black can well stand on this bit of evidence, that Dudley and Rathbone had both trained if not under, then with him when he "soaped" Indiana in 1880.

But let us travel on. As soon as appointed chief of this division, as I have said, perhaps the most important in the bureau, the division was practically segregated from the bureau by Colonel Dudley's order and placed under Rathbone's control. There is no dispute about this. It is shown that at the time he assumed control he was utterly incompetent. It is so testified to by Colonel Dudley's successor, who had been in the service nearly twenty years, and also by Mr. Peyton, a very intelligent witness. I read from Peyton's evidence, pages 111 and 112 of the report:

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Were you in the office when Mr. Rathbone was first appointed chief of the special examination division?

A. I was.

Q. Tell me what efficiency or knowledge he had of the duties of the position to which he was appointed.

A. I presume that he was totally ignorant of pension matters, as Mr. Clarke has testified here.

Q. Do you not know of your own personal knowledge that Mr. Rathbone knew nothing of the pension business when he was appointed to that position?

A. I do not think that Mr. Rathbone was at all familiar with the pension business.

Q. How long was it after he came into the office before he became efficient in that business?

A. I can not say. I do not think that Mr. Rathbone is very well posted upon pension laws and the technicalities of the pension business to-day.

Q. State whether or not it is a fact that Welty and Lyon, the assistant chiefs of that division, were left, in point of fact, to run the division.

A. That is my opinion.

Q. What was Mr. Rathbone's share of the work in that division?

A. I think it related mostly to matters outside of the office.

Q. In other words he did not undertake to run the office?

A. He did while he was here, but I think the other men furnished him all the information he had, and that he relied on them altogether.

Q. While Mr. Rathbone was in Cincinnati in October state what the understanding in the Pension Office was as to what he was engaged in out there.

A. It was generally understood that he had gone away for political purposes, and it was stated that he would not come back until the election was over. It was a sort of mystery there. Nobody could find out where he was. I recollect that I wanted to write him a letter, and they told me that he was away and would not be back until after the election; that was common talk among the clerks.

Q. When did you first find out where he was?

A. I think I did not have any official knowledge of where he was until he rendered his expense account from the 17th to the 27th of October.

Now I read from ex-Commissionor Clarke's evidence, page 67 of the report:

Q. When was he appointed?

A. I do not know; but I think it was about July, 1883.

Q. Did he stay in that position in 1884 without knowing anything more of the duties of the position?

A. Within a few days after his appointment he went into the field.

Q. What did he do there?

A. I suppose he instructed the supervisors in their duties, and got the lay of the ground.

Q. Do you think that he knew anything about the duties of the office up to the fall of 1884?

A. I do not think he did.

Q. He knew practically but very little of the duties?

A. I think so. I think I have heard him say so himself.

Q. What is he doing now?

A. He is chief of that division.

Q. Is he still chief of it?

A. Yes.

Q. And he still knows nothing about his duties practically?

A. He has been in the office since I have had charge it, and I suppose that within that time he has learned to understand his business pretty well.

Q. How long have you been in the Pension Office?

A. About eighteen years.

Q. And you have gone up from what place to the Commissionership?

A. From a first-class clerkship.

Q. And you have a practical knowledge of all the workings of the office from top to bottom?

A. I understand them pretty well.

Before I leave this point, let me read from Commissioner Clarke's evidence, page 66, to show the demoralization of that division under Mr. Rathbone's administration:

Q. Who were the assistants in Mr. Rathbone's division?

A. Mr. John M. Welty and Mr. George A. Lyon.

Q. What has become of these gentlemen? Do they still occupy the same positions?

A. They were transferred to an adjudicating division.

Q. Did that transfer reduce them?

A. No, sir; it did necessarily reduce them.

Q. Why were they transferred?

A. Because of the demoralized condition of the examiner's division, for which I thought they were responsible.

Q. What was that demoralization?

A. It was a general demoralization.

Q. Of what nature—neglect of business, or irregularities, or corrupt practices, or what?

A. Not personal irregularities, but a general demoralized condition. There was no discipline in the division. It was a general demoralization—pretty much everything except personal corruption.

Q. How did that demoralization show itself?

A. By criminations and recriminations among the force. It is pretty hard to describe, but it was there nevertheless; and the only way to abate it was to make changes.

Q. Was one of the charges alleged drunkenness on the part of Welty?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you find, in your investigations, that there was any truth in that charge?

A. If I were on a jury I do not think I would have convicted him on the evidence; but there was a strong presumption as to the truth of the charge, and upon a question of discipline, I would not stop to consider any more than to satisfy myself what was the proper thing to do.

Q. And you thought it best for him to go?

A. Yes.

I need not say more on this point. It is clear that Mr. Dudley understood his man, and the man understood for what he was wanted. I now turn my attention to his misconduct in office.

It appears that just before the October election in 1884, Mr. Rathbone turned up in the city of Cincinnati. He had reached that point by a circuitous route, ostensibly in the public service. Early in the month of October, however, while in Cincinnati, he applied for a leave of absence and obtained it, and entered heart and soul into political work in that city. He himself admits, under oath, that he held a United States deputy marshal's commission under Lot Wright, and went armed on election day. He remained there until after the October election, and when his leave of absence expired again resumed his work ostensibly, and returned to Washington by a circuitous route, managing, as the testimony shows, to have his expenses paid by the Government both ways. He was not only there himself, but there was another man from the Pension Office also there by the name of Jacobs—by the way, still in the service in that Bureau.

This man, Jacobs, who claims to have gone to Cincinnati on some special work for the Pension Office, likewise applied for leave and obtained the same, and engaged in political work there. At the expiration of his leave of absence he returned to Washington, having his expenses paid by the Government both ways. During the first nine days of the month of October, this man Jacobs was ostensibly engaged in some special work for the Pension Office, and about the 10th of the month rendered his reports to the Pension Office for the first nine day's services of that month. These reports were rejected by Commissioner Clarke, who was then the acting Commissioner, on the ground that they did not show that he was performing any services. When Jacobs received notice of the disallowance of his reports, he at once, with the knowledge and consent of his chief, Mr. Rathbone, addressed a letter to the assistant chief in the Pension Office, requesting that his reports for the first nine days of October be returned to him. The letter was marked "personal," and reached the office without the knowledge of the acting Commissioner. The letter was as follows:

[Personal.]

CINCINNATI, OHIO, October 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Will you please return to me my daily reports for October 1st to 9th, inclusive, and much oblige,

Yours, respectfully,

J. E. JACOBS.

Mr. JOHN M. WELTY.

Appended to that letter is a memorandum of Mr. Rathbone:

Will Mr. Welty please do this?

RATHBONE.

Mr. Welty directed these reports to be sent to Mr. Jacobs, and a letter was prepared by Mr. Peyton, the clerk having the custody of the daily reports of the special examiners, for the signature of Major Clarke, which letter notified Mr. Jacobs that in compliance with his request the daily reports were returned. The Acting Commissioner refused to sign this letter, and retained the reports as parts of the records of the office. These reports are found in the published report on pages 103, 104, 105, and they show no service whatever. It was after all this had occurred that Mr. Jacobs applied for and obtained leave of absence covering that period. He continued absent from the office, according to the testimony of Mr. Peyton, until the 29th of December, without making any daily reports whatever. He subsequently applied for and obtained leave of absence covering all this period, and Mr. Peyton testifies, on page 105 of the report, that Jacobs's reports show no official results from the time he left Washington until his return; so that we have it in black and white that this man was in Cincinnati engaged in politics and that Jacobs, with the full knowledge and consent of Rathbone, had endeavored, by a secret correspondence held with Welty, the acting chief of his division, to abstract from the public records his daily reports without any knowledge or consent on the part of the acting Commissioner.

This is but a sample of the character of correspondence being carried on between Mr. Rathbone and Mr. Welty underneath the acting Commissioner of Pensions. The ex-Commissioner of Pensions states emphatically that neither Mr. Rathbone nor Mr. Dudley had any right to be carrying on any sort of official correspondence with subordinates in the office without his knowledge while he was acting Commissioner. He furthermore says that upon ascertaining this fact he called the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to it, and he issued an order for no mail to be sent and none received except through the Commissioner of Pensions himself.

It also appears that on the 4th day of October, the very day Mr. Rathbone took his leave of absence, he issued the following order:

CINCINNATI, October 4, 1884.

Direct H. Perry Smith to report to Eppert for duty at once. Answer.
E. G. RATHBONE, Chief.

To D. T. WHITE, Supervising Examiner,
Indianapolis.

The Commissioner says in regard to this telegram that he knew nothing of it. I quote his language, found on page 55 of the report:

Q. Did you know anything of that telegram?
A. I did not.
Q. That purports to be a telegram sent from Cincinnati by Mr. Rathbone, chief of the special examining division, to the supervising examiner at Indianapolis.
A. Yes.
Q. Who is H. Perry Smith, the person mentioned in this telegram?
A. He is a pension examiner in the office.
Q. Do you know whether Mr. Smith responded at once by reporting at Cincinnati?
A. I have no knowledge whatever about it.
Q. Had Mr. Rathbone any right, authority of law, or authority of the acting Commissioner to send such an order from Cincinnati to the supervising examiner at Indianapolis?
A. He had no authority from me.
Q. Is it or is it not a violation of the rules of the Pension Office?
A. I should say it was; most certainly.
Q. This correspondence seems generally to have been carried on between Mr. Rathbone, Commissioner Dudley, and those other examiners without the knowledge of the Pension Office?
A. Yes.

Here is another sample of the same character of work. I quote from the testimony of the Commissioner, page 54 of the report:

Q. Look at this telegram [handing one to witness] and state whether you ever saw that before, or not, or knew of any such telegram.
A. No, sir; I never saw it before, and never heard of it.
Q. Please read it.
A. (Reading.) "New York, September 8, 1884. To George Emerson, Laconia, N. H. Letter received; would like you to get to Cleveland soon as convenient; any time this week will do. E. G. Rathbone, chief."
Q. Mr. Rathbone is the chief of the special examiners' division, is he not?
A. Yes.
Q. You have stated that Mr. Rathbone was not on duty at the office at that time.
A. No, sir.
Q. Here seem to be two other telegrams relating to Mr. Noble [handing them to the witness]. Look at them and see whether you ever saw them before, or knew that any such telegrams had been sent or any such orders given?
A. (After examining.) No, sir; I never saw either of them before or heard of either of them.
Q. Read the first of them.
A. (Reading.) "New York, September 6, 1884. To John H. Stibbs, room 92, post-office building, Chicago, Ill. Direct Special Examiner Noble to report at once to Supervising Examiner Duncan, Columbus, Ohio, for duty temporarily. E. G. Rathbone, chief."
Q. Now read the other telegram.
A. (Reading.) "New York, September 6, 1884. To R. A. Duncan, care of pension agent, Columbus, Ohio. Noble, of Chicago, directed to report to you. Commissioner's letter received. E. G. Rathbone, chief."
Q. State what letter that refers to.
A. I do not know.
Q. Was it a letter from you as acting Commissioner?
A. No, sir.
Q. Then it must have been a letter from whom?
A. I presume from the Commissioner of Pensions, who was then absent from the office. Still I ought to state that the mail of the office is very heavy, requiring an hour and a half or two hours to sign it. Of course that would not afford me any time to criticise letters.
Q. Then this correspondence between the Commissioner of Pensions, who was at Columbus, and the chief of the special examiners' division, and certain other chiefs, was being carried on covertly and without your knowledge as acting Commissioner, was it?
A. It would seem so from the papers shown to me.
Q. Do you know whether Mr. Noble obeyed this telegram or not?
A. I do not know.
Q. If he did so, it was without your knowledge?
A. Yes.
Q. And was all this correspondence which you have seen irregular?
A. I should say so, &c.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party now in power may learn a valuable lesson from this testimony. In every Department of this Government to-day nearly every chief of a division and some of the heads of bureaus have been retained; but few changes, comparatively speaking, have been made; and yet the Democratic party, charged with the responsibility of Government, must and will be held responsible by the country for the correct administration of affairs.

If this improper correspondence, in violation of the rules of the Pension Office, could be secretly and successfully carried on under a Republican administration, to the detriment of the public service and to the demoralization of that bureau, without detection by its chief until it was brought to light by an examining committee of the House of Representatives, what may we expect when these same people are retained in office under an administration to which they are unfriendly? I invite the attention of the country to the candid consideration of the question presented. This very man Jacobs, of whom I have spoken, and Welty also are still in the Pension Office, and many other persons whose names have been mentioned in this evidence are still in the public service, some of them in important places.

There are other branches of the public service subjected to the same abuses that sprung up in the Pension Office. The railway mail service, for instance, ramifies the entire country, and is out from under the immediate supervision of the heads of the Departments. I may at some future day have occasion to refer, in this connection, to that branch of the public service.

Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned for this brief digression. I now return to the subject under consideration that I may point out one other abuse in the Pension Office developed by that investigation. During the investigation referred to the committee required Mr. Brock, a clerk in the Pension Office, whose duty it was to keep an account of the leaves of absence of the various employés of that office, to prepare a statement. He prepared a partial statement, and it is found on pages 228, 229, and 230 of the published report. It shows that thirty-nine employés in that bureau were absent with pay, in excess of their annual leave, for various periods of time during that year. In almost every instance this leave was granted during the fall elections, and granted by the acting Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Joslyn, and without the recommendation of the acting Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Clarke.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these abuses were all developed by that investigation. The attention of Mr. Dudley was called to them. He had every opportunity of reading the testimony; and I believe that in no instance has he been able to explain, upon any reasonable hypothesis, why these abuses were permitted. In many instances he asserted his ignorance of these things; but he could not hope to be otherwise when his own time was being devoted to the Ohio and Indiana campaigns to the neglect of the duties of the Pension Office.

It has been repeatedly said—and, among others, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], not now in his seat—that when General Dudley entered politics in the Ohio and Indiana campaign he disconnected himself from the Pension Office, and that when he went there he went with the intention of not returning to the Pension Office. I propose to fix the dates in connection with this matter by the record, upon the sworn testimony of Commissioner Clarke, and by the admissions of General Dudley.

General Dudley left the Pension Office on the 3d of September, 1884; he returned to the city about September 14, 1884—certainly between that time and the 21st of September. Between the 14th and the 21st of September of that year he tendered his resignation, to take effect on the 10th of November following. He left the city on the 21st of September, in the same year, and returned again on the 16th of October.

It is said that he had no connection with the Pension Office after he tendered his resignation. He states in his testimony on pages 251 and 252 that he was here after he returned on the 16th of October for nearly a week, and that he was acting Commissioner and signed at that time considerable of the mail of the Pension Office.

W. W. Dudley's testimony, page 251:

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. When this letter that you speak of having been sent to you by the Secretary of the Interior, touching alleged violations of the civil-service law, reached you, were you then officially employed in the Pension Office?
A. I was.
Q. Had you at that time notified Mr. Clarke of the fact?
A. I did not think it necessary to notify my subordinates. They found me there. I did notify my superior of the fact.
Q. You had previously done that?
A. Yes. I think that immediately on my return I notified the Secretary of the Interior.
Q. How long had you been away at that time?
A. Forty-six days, I think.
Q. How much of that time had you been in the office?
A. About a week.
Q. And then you left again?

A. Yes. I did not do much duty in the office, owing to the fact that my wife was dangerously ill and I spent part of the day with her. I signed my official mail, but I did not do the signing of the certificates.
Q. How large a part of the official mail did you sign?
A. I signed considerable of it; I can not say how much.
Q. With Mr. Clarke's knowledge?
A. I do not know; I can not say.
Q. Do you know any document which you signed at that time? Is there anything in the office to show it?
A. Yes; I signed my official report for one thing. I did not sign it at that time, however, but later.
Q. What other official papers did you sign?
A. I can not tell; quite a number of them.
Q. Is there anything in the office to show what you signed?
A. I think there may be a number of letters signed by me—letters to the special examination division.

Why did General Dudley return on the 16th of October? The testimony does not disclose the reason; but there is this significant circumstance which I submit to the candid consideration of all. The letter of the Civil Service Reform Association, of New York, dated October 11, 1884, reached the President about that period, and went to the Secretary of the Interior; and General Dudley returned here about three days after the arrival of this letter. The coincidence is marked, and the conclusion is irresistible, that the letter caused him to return.

What other work did he do during the week that he was in the Pension Office? Why, sir, one thing that he did is perhaps without a parallel—certainly in judicial procedure—in the history of the whole country; and that is, according to his own testimony, he set the assistant Commissioner of Pensions at work to ascertain and report the facts with reference to the charges which the Civil Service Commission had made against him. His own testimony, on page 252 of the record, shows this. I quote it:

Q. I am talking about the matters of the Pension Office.
A. No, sir; there was but one head of the office.
Q. Mr. Clarke says he was governing there.
A. I can not help what Mr. Clarke says. He was not Commissioner while I was there.
Q. Was he acting Commissioner?
A. He signed his name as such on papers; but he was not acting Commissioner of Pensions while I was there.
Q. So you tell the committee that you directed the deputy Commissioner to investigate you and to make a report to the Secretary of the Interior as to what you had been doing while you were at the same time acting as Commissioner?—A. I did; and I think it would be grossly bad taste on my part to investigate myself and to report to the Secretary. I so felt at that time, and I feel so now. It made no difference to me who examined the matter. I wanted it examined, and wanted it done quickly, and the letter answered properly and truthfully.
Q. You said that you were in the office a week on that occasion. Where did you go, then?
A. To Indiana.

Q. How long did you stay there then?
A. Until after the November election, I think. I think I arrived here on Saturday of election week, which would be about the 8th of November.

In order that there may be no mistake, I also quote from the testimony of Major Clarke, on page 70 of the report; and also extracts from his answer to the Secretary of the Interior, charging Colonel Dudley with violation of the civil-service laws. I quote it:

Q. I find in your testimony taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, a copy of the official letter of Mr. Dudley to the assistant Secretary of the Interior, which reads as follows:
"I have the honor to report that I returned to my post of duty on Thursday, the 16th October, having been absent therefrom forty-one days in all. I was absent on the 17th day of October, and returned again to duty Saturday, October 18, and am now on duty as Commissioner."
Q. Did Mr. Dudley leave the office after that?
A. Yes. He was there, I think, a week after that.
Q. Then he assumed to be on duty here at that time?
A. I gathered so from his letter, but that is only an inference.
Q. Had you any knowledge of his performing any of the duties of the office after the date of his letter?
A. I thought he was not performing any duty.
Q. Did he, during that time, sign any letters or official papers?
A. I inquired after he had gone whether he had or not, and I was told that he had. I was groping in the dark.
Q. Do you know whether, during that time, he gave any orders to anybody in the special examiners' division or any other division?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did he send away any examiners from here, so far as you know, while he was here after the date of that letter?
A. No, sir. I thought he was at the office simply as a matter of convenience, being in town. I supposed that he had no connection or business with the office. I want to emphasize that, because it puts me in a somewhat contradictory position here. I think that about the time that this letter of Mr. Dudley's was written, wherein he states that he is now on duty as Commissioner of Pensions, a reference came to me through the Secretary of the Interior of a communication sent to him by Mr. Wheeler, the attorney of the Civil Service Association in New York. It reached me through the Secretary's office by reference when Mr. Dudley was in the office. I think it was the same day that he came there. That is my impression. The messenger who brought it to my office seeing Mr. Dudley at his desk, and the communication being addressed to the Commissioner himself, took the paper to him. It was the complaint of the Civil Service Association in New York.
Q. I think you have been asked to produce that paper and the reply to it. Have you them with you?
A. I have them not now, but I will produce them.
The witness subsequently produced the papers, of which the following are copies:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 20, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter of Everett P. Wheeler, esq., of New York city, dated October 11, 1884, addressed to the President, and by him referred to you the 13th instant, "for an investigation of the charges made therein," and the same having been referred by you to this office for report, I respectfully submit the following for your consideration:
Mr. Wheeler writes as counsel for the Civil Service Reform Association, and invites the attention of the President to the fact that Hon. Mr. W. W. Dudley, Commissioner of Pensions, is absent from his post, engaged in conducting the canvass of the Republican party in Ohio, to the entire neglect of his official duties.
He also states that certain charges have been publicly made, which he has not denied, setting forth that Commissioner Dudley has given orders for applications for pensions in behalf of those who are voters and residing in Ohio and Indiana, to be taken up out of their order and have a preference in their examination over the claims of those residing in many of the other States.
Upon these points I will state briefly that Commissioner Dudley left the city on or about September 3d last, when the duties of the office devolved upon me.
On or about ———— Colonel Dudley returned to the city, and while here handed you his resignation as Commissioner of Pensions, the same to take effect November 10 next. He again left the city on September 21, and returned on the 16th of October instant.
* * * * * * *
I am, sir, respectfully,
O. P. G. CLARKE,
Acting Commissioner.
The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

But it appears from Major Clarke's evidence that Colonel Dudley's presence in the Pension Office was a mere pretense; that he did not regard him as acting Commissioner of Pensions at that time. And this leads us irresistibly to the conclusion that he was back from the Ohio campaign in order to meet the charges made by the Civil Service Reform Association of New York. We again quote from Major Clarke's evidence, page 72 of the report:

The WITNESS. Mr. Dudley brought the Secretary's letter to me open. I suppose that he had opened it. I mention this to show that I did not think he was acting then as Commissioner of Pensions. As the charge was made directly against him I did not consult him on the matter and would not hear one word from him on the subject. He came to me and talked on the outside of this business, and I said to him, "Mr. Dudley, I do not wish you to say one word to me on this subject. I will answer this letter myself, without any reference whatever to you." Once or twice perhaps, before I got all the material and facts together to enable me to make a proper answer, Mr. Dudley introduced the subject, and every time I shut him off, saying to him, "I do not want any information whatever on this subject from you, and you will never see my reply to this communication until it is written and signed, and an official paper. Then, if you have a woman's curiosity, I will have no objection to your seeing what I have done." He never saw it, and had not a word to say about my answer. He never was permitted to dot an "i" or to cross a "t" in it, and it was sent without supposing that he had in the remotest degree any connection with the office.
Q. Then he manifested a desire to talk to you about it?
A. He spoke about it once or twice. I mention this circumstance only to show that I would not have taken that high-handed position if I had supposed that Mr. Dudley was then himself Commissioner of Pensions.
Q. You did not consider that he was acting as Commissioner of Pensions, or that he had any right to sign official papers as such during that time?
A. No, sir. I want to say a little further, because this is a matter which seems to affect my official work somewhat, Mr. Dudley was at his desk when Mr. Joslyn, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, came to talk with me upon some office business (I do not know the nature of it now), and I said to Mr. Joslyn, "I wish you would tell Mr. Dudley to leave this office and get out of it. He has no business here, and it embarrasses me very much to have him here. If he has come for duty, I am content, but he is simply in the office sitting at his desk, and to me it looks very wrong." I made that statement to the Acting Secretary of the Interior at that time in my office. I mention it to show the good faith in which I was acting toward Mr. Dudley and the office.
Q. Mr. Dudley had, previous to that time, placed his resignation in the hands of the President to take effect on the 10th of November?
A. Yes.
By Mr. ROGERS:
Q. Why was it that you thought that Mr. Dudley had no business in the office under those circumstances?
A. Because upon the face of it, it was a very improper thing.
Q. Why was it an improper thing?
A. Because he had not reported to me that he was there for duty, and I did not think there ought to be any possible connection between a man who had no interest there—and who might possibly do something if he wanted to—and the acting Commissioner of Pensions. I think that the acting Commissioner should be absolutely free.
Q. In other words, you thought that Mr. Dudley was not acting as Commissioner of Pensions, and as he had been charged in the public prints with being in Ohio and Indiana mixing up in politics, he ought to be out of the Pension Office and not connecting himself with it?
A. Yes; having sent in his resignation, I thought it improper and impolitic for him to be in the office. I do not answer the part of your question as to what he was doing when he was absent. That is a matter of history, and of course stands by itself.
Q. At that time the charge had come to your attention through the Secretary of the Interior from the Civil-Service Association at New York that Mr. Dudley was out in Ohio and Indiana dabbling in politics?
A. Yes.
Q. And you thought that if that was true he had no business at the head of the Pension Office under those circumstances?
A. Yes; that is just what I thought, and it worried me very much.

To sum it all up, Mr. Dudley emphatically swears that he was in the Pension Office in the discharge of the duties of the Pension Commissioner. Mr. Clarke squarely denies it, and goes so far as to say that he told Mr. Josyln, then Acting Secretary of the Interior, that he wished Mr. Dudley would leave the office and get out of it; that he had no business there. The impropriety was manifest to Major Clarke. He seemed to think that as Mr. Dudley was going to conduct the Ohio and Indiana campaigns that he ought to disconnect himself from the Pension Office and stay out of it. Mr. Dudley seemed to think that there was no impropriety in this, and proceeded to discharge such duties as he saw fit.

We can hardly conceive of a greater farce than that which Mr. Dudley suggests, namely, that while acting Commissioner he had directed his assistant commissioner to investigate and report upon charges made against him.

Within a week after the 16th of October Mr. Dudley left the Pension Office, again returned to Indiana, and did not return again until after the November elections.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Dudley did not proceed in this matter from ignorance. He is a man of intelligence and capacity; he is clear-headed, and understood the duties of his office. I believe that he was a good organizer. I believe if he had kept out of politics that he could have elevated the standard of the Pension Office and accomplished great good in that branch of the service. As an evidence of that fact, and as an evidence of his bad faith in the conduct and management of that office, and in the example which he personally set for his employés, I desire to quote from his own testimony, which will speak for itself.

W. W. Dudley's testimony, pages 264, 265, 266, 267:

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. I understood you to say a moment ago that you regard the employés of the Pension Office as being of a higher standard for integrity and efficiency and fidelity than the employés of any other Department of the Government; am I right in that?

A. They are as high as any, and would compare favorably with the employés in any other office of the Government, taking them as a whole.

Q. You meant to say in that that there was no general dereliction of duty on their part, and that the office is in good working shape and is not demoralized?

A. Yes, it was when I left it.

Q. How was it when you found it?

A. It was a very good office when I found it. There were some practices in it which did not strike me as being the proper thing. There was time wasted, and there were some things which I endeavored to correct by proper circulars and orders and discipline.

Q. Time wasted; that is a very important demoralizing influence, is it not?

A. I think so.

Q. How long were you away yourself last fall in all?

A. I was away fifty-seven days in all.

Q. Do you govern yourself, in taking leave of absence, by the same rules which obtain in regard to subordinate employés?

A. No, sir; and the same rule does not obtain as to the chiefs of bureaus and heads of Departments.

Q. You do not confine yourself to thirty days leave in the year?

A. No, sir; and it is not the custom to do so.

Q. So you took fifty-seven days' leave of absence, did you?

A. Yes; and I took four days in June at the time of the Indiana State convention.

Q. That was sixty-one days?

A. Yes; and there may have been an occasional day at other times.

Q. And, as I understand you, you have frankly stated that during that period you were engaged in political work for your party in Indiana and Ohio, except for the four days that you were attending the Indiana State convention?

A. During the latter sixteen days I was not very active in politics. I was at home with my friends.

Q. Where?

A. In Richmond, Ind.

Q. With those exceptions were you engaged in politics during your absence?

A. I was when I was in Columbus, Ohio, and for three days in Indianapolis.

Q. I want to ask you, in that connection, if you think that it had a very healthful influence on the organization and efficiency of your bureau to have it understood there, as well as all over the country, that its head had quitted his post and gone into the country and had staid away the length of time you have stated looking after political interests?

A. In my judgment it should have no deleterious influence on the office.

Q. You think not?

A. No, sir; unless it was understood that I was acting as Commissioner at the same time. If I were assuming to discharge the duties of the office at the same time I think it would have a bad influence. But if I had disengaged myself from the office and was not asserting any control over it it would not properly have any deleterious effect.

Q. I call your attention to a circular of yours, published on November 11, 1882. You say in this circular, "I am very sorry to be compelled to call the marked attention of the employés of this office to an evil that, if there is power enough vested in me, and I think there is, shall no longer remain as a stigma upon this office.

"In return for the pay you receive for your services you owe the Government and the almost despairing claimants before this office six and a half hours of honest, industrious labor every working day except Saturday, and five and one-half hours on that day, and any encroachments you make upon that time for any purpose, or upon any excuse, save only actual sickness or leave of absence, is at the expense of your personal honesty."

The WITNESS. I would like to reiterate that.

Q. What do you think about that principle now when you apply it to your own leave of absence for six or eight weeks?

A. I think I came within the exceptions named there, and I want to say that instead of working six and a half hours a day I worked for twelve hours a day.

Q. Do you mean in Indiana, or in the Pension Office?

A. I mean in the office. I think I worked eighteen hours a day when I was in Columbus.

Q. But not for the Government?

A. No; for my party.

Q. What do you think of the application of that principle to your absence in Indiana and Ohio?

A. I think that the rule applies to me which applies to other heads of Departments and bureau officers. I think that my absence from the office was a great deal less than that of a good many officers of the Government.

Q. As Commissioner of Pensions would you have applied the same rule to other employés of the Pension Office?

A. To the extent of their regular leave of absence.

Q. But would you have permitted them to be absent for sixty-one days?

A. Not with pay.

Q. But if you could take sixty-one days' leave of absence with pay you could on the same principle take the whole three hundred and sixty-five days?

A. That is a problem in ethics which you are as able to solve as I am. Let me say, in further answer to the question that I was entirely conscious of having worked much more than the law required or expected of me during the time I was in the office. I had worked much more time in the office than I had spent out of the office.

Mr. ROGERS. Many of us here have to do the same thing, but still we do not leave.

The WITNESS. But I understand that for a good half of the year and more you are receiving your full pay as members of Congress while you are indulging in political work.

Mr. ROGERS. Still, that is part of our contract.

The WITNESS. I regarded mine in the same way.

Mr. ROGERS. That you could leave the office and stay away half the year?

The WITNESS. No; but that I could stay away sixty-one days, and more if necessary.

Mr. ROGERS. I read again from this circular of November 11, 1882: "Now you would not wish it known to the country and its defenders that the fifteen minutes required at morning and at noon to get from the street to your desk is taken by you from the time which is theirs, nor would you like them to know that the half hour allowed for lunch is extended to nearly an hour by your eating lunch, when you should be at work, and spending the lunch-time on the street." What does that mean?

The WITNESS. That means just exactly what it says. There is nothing incongruous in that. That is good English. It means that when the lunch-hour arrived they had already eaten their lunch, and then had gone and spent their lunch-hour on the street. I will let that stand on its merits.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not going into the question of grammar. I only wanted to know what you meant; but, as you say, let it stand on its merits. (Continuing to read.) "Would you wish claimants who are waiting and hoping that you will settle their cases soon, that the winter wolf may be kept from the door, to witness the entire cessation of work which with many too often takes place at quarter past 12 and quarter before 4 each day, that you may be out of the office at 12.30 and 4 o'clock? * * * No example is furnished by a single officer of this bureau for the reckless waste of time which it is my intention by this circular order to put an end to, nor can there be any reasonable excuse offered for it." Now, do you not think, in view of this circular, that you yourself set an example of reckless waste of time?

The WITNESS. If I did I offset it fully by setting the example of working a great many more hours than any other employé of the office.

Mr. ROGERS. And the chief of the special examination division, was he not also setting a bad example in staying away more than thirty days (not on pay, however)?

The WITNESS. If he took leave of absence without pay it would certainly not be a disadvantage to the office.

Q. But was not the country entitled to his services?

A. Certainly; if it paid him for them.

Q. Was not the Pension Office needing his services, whether paid or not paid? Was it not his business to be there unless he was sick, and was not the country needing his services there?

A. I think that for the time being he could be well spared.

Q. Would you consent to have all the employés of the office stay away from business that length of time, even though they were not paid beyond their regular thirty days' leave?

A. If they were absent in the exercise of the highest duties of an American citizen, I would say yes.

Q. Would you let them all go home and engage in political work for fifteen days without pay; would you give them leave of absence to be out of the office for fifteen days and to engage in a political campaign?

A. I am rather inclined to believe that I should, if they had a right to vote, and if they believed it their duty to exercise that right.

Q. And if you had at the same time three hundred thousand pensioners depending on the work of the office, and if the Government had already given the employés their thirty days' leave of absence, you would still give them fifteen days more, would you?

A. That is rather too broad a question when you put it that way. The circumstances of each case would have to determine it. It might be that it would be entirely fair to do it, and it might that it would not be right or proper. Each individual case would have to stand by itself.

Q. You would not only let them go home to vote, but you would let them go into another State to engage in political work there?

A. I think that a man is none the less a citizen because he is an employé of the Government.

Q. You would let them not only go home to vote, but you would let them go into another State and work half a month there in politics if they would abandon their pay?

A. I will say in answer to that question that I would not abridge the rights of any man.

Q. Is that an answer to my question?

A. I think so.

Q. Under your obligations to the country and to the Pension Office as Commissioner of Pensions, do you think you would be performing your duties properly if you were to let the whole force leave and go into a political campaign?

A. No, sir; I do not think I would.

Q. That is what you did yourself.

A. I do not wish you to put words in mouth in that way.

Q. Did you not do that?

A. I had disengaged myself from the office to go into the political campaign.

Mr. ROGERS. I was trying to make an application of your own conduct to the whole office.

The WITNESS. I saw your point.

Q. Now, I want to call your attention to another part of your circular [reading]: "There are, I am happy to say, many to whom the circular has no application; probably almost as many as there are to whom it does." In other words, as I understand it, you state here that, at that time, more than one-half of the clerks in the Pension Office were in the habit of wasting their time. This is correct, is it not?

A. You can draw your own inference from it. The intention was to have the circular apply only to those to whom it did apply, and not to censure those who were faithful.

Mr. ROGERS. You say that it has no application to probably almost as many as it has application to?

The WITNESS. You can see the necessity of wording it in that way. It wouldn't be right to make a sweeping assertion against all. It is true that there were abuses of that kind which I sought to correct. It was a mere matter of office regulation.

Mr. ROGERS. And your idea was that more than one-half of the clerks were in the habit of wasting their time?

The WITNESS. I will state it just as I have stated it there. I stated it in general terms so that it might not be taken as an unjust censure on those to whom it did not apply.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to repeat this to you [reading]: "There are, I am happy to say, many to whom this circular has no application, probably almost as many as there are to whom it does." What did you mean by that?

The WITNESS. There may have been many to whom it had no application—more than there were to whom it had application. I can not give the numerical relative strength of those to whom it did apply and of those to whom it did not apply.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not ask you to do so. I asked you what you mean by those words?

The WITNESS. I meant just what I said; that there were many of them to whom it did not apply.

Mr. ROGERS [again reading from the circular]: "Chiefs of division are hereby required to furnish the chief clerk weekly with a report showing the names of those who, after the delivery of this circular to them, continue the embezzlement of time complained of." What did you mean by that?

The WITNESS. Perhaps that was not a happy expression, in the legal signification of the phrase, but it expressed the idea which I meant to convey.

Mr. ROGERS. As I understand, what you meant to say there was that when a man wasted the public time for which he was paid, he was embezzling the time which belonged to the Government.

The WITNESS. What I meant by embezzlement in the circular was pinching the hours of work.

Mr. ROGERS. Would not that apply as well to the head of the Bureau as to the subordinates?

The WITNESS. You must be your own judge of that. I did not set an example of the practice complained of in that circular; neither did any of the officers of the bureau, and I may state that the effect of that circular on the work of the office was very salutary.

Mr. ROGERS. I think it is a very proper circular if the facts set forth were true; but I was trying to get you to reconcile it with your own conduct in staying away from the office attending to political work.

This volume contains other evidences of abuses in that office while under the management of Colonel Dudley. Some of it has been adverted to by other speakers. It is too voluminous to go into. My remarks are already protracted too much. The fact is, the whole office became demoralized, and was perverted during the campaign of 1884 to the most unholy purposes.

When we reflect that three hundred thousand claimants awaited the adjudication of their claims, that many had been waiting for years in absolute need and want; that the office was months, if not years, behind with its work; that Congress had given him ample means and force, more than any other Commissioner had ever asked for or had; and that all this was disregarded, and that its chief abandoned his post, and subordinates sent to the front by scores to the political battlefield, the whole office consequently demoralized, while worthy and needy claimants were postponed, one can scarcely contemplate with patience Colonel Dudley's evidence, bold and defiant as it is to every sense of public duty, humanity, common decency, and right. No wonder that the country has demanded reform in the civil service. No wonder Indiana repudiated him and the country his party. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not refrain from expressing the conviction that a practical civil-service reform suggests getting rid of the worst element left in the service, and that right speedily. I believe new blood at the head of all bureaus, divisions, and places of responsibility to be absolutely indispensable to true civil-service reform. I believe that every party charged with the responsibility has the right to administer the Government through those friendly to its principles and policies. I do not believe it can be successfully and safely done otherwise.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to those who have assailed the South, those who have recklessly spoken of Southern Representatives as ballot-box stuffers and murderers, that they neither honor themselves nor their country. The South is quiet, and is struggling to regain its former prosperity. It is improving and developing, and all classes living happily together. The general elections of 1884 were as fair and quiet as in Iowa or New Jersey. In my own State I do not remember of any disturbance at the polls for years. There has rarely been a contest for office in the courts or in the Legislature. I say upon my honor as a gentleman and a Representative, so far as my observation has gone, everybody, without distinction as to race or color, who is qualified, votes as he chooses, and his vote is counted; and the significant coincidence occurred that while the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Ohio stood in their places "waving the bloody shirt" and denouncing Southern Representatives negroes by the hundred were en route, or had just arrived in Arkansas, to become citizens. The simple statement as I get it from the public press disproves the charges you make against us. They are unjust and they are untrue. Is the time never to come when sectional criminations and recriminations shall stop? Is there no mission for us but to slander each other?

Mr. Chairman, if I do not mistake every sign, the bloody shirt will never be borne to victory again in this country. It has won its last battle. The country demands of us something better and higher. When strikes are of daily occurrence, when labor is idle, when agriculture barely yields a living, when our industries are all languishing and our fiscal policy unsettled and our taxes undiminished, surely there is enough to engross our serious thoughts and to induce us to turn away from the sectional animosities of the unhappy past.

For one, I had thought I should never embark in anything like a political discussion here; but I am unwilling to permit the charges which have been made against a people who have honored me, and a people utterly incapable of doing what they are charged with, pass without at least entering an earnest denial. This I have done from a sense of duty and in the hope that what I have said may not be without some good result to them. This is my apology for having occupied the time of the committee.

[During the delivery of his speech, not having time to complete what he wished to say, Mr. ROGERS asked permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope that leave will be accorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection; and leave is granted.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Chairman, I had supposed when this bill was brought into the House that it would have been promptly passed after a brief explanation by the gentleman who reported it. I had never supposed that a bill of this character, which simply appropriated the pension-money provided for by law, would excite here such a debate as it has, and least of all did I suppose the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], one of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, would rise in his seat when a bill was to be passed principally for the benefit of the people in his own section of the country and deliver himself of an excited speech and thrust into the faces of the representatives of the Southern people every disagreeable thing that he could think of to make them feel humiliated and discredited.

It is true that the gentleman, with an exuberance of patronizing kindness, told us that the lecture he delivered was in fraternity of spirit. But God save us from such fraternity as that! However ingeniously put, the gentleman's lecture was but a reminder to Southern Representatives that they had acted badly in the matter of a vote which they had given, and cautioned, if not commanded, them that they should do better hereafter.

Now, I am ready as a Representative to do my duty on this floor as I see it and as I know it. I was an humble follower of the confederate cause, and so far as I could did my duty to it. I am here to make no apology for that. When the flag of the confederacy went down and my people surrendered, along with them I surrendered in good faith and pledged anew my honest devotion to the Union of these States and to the Constitution of the country. And whatever gentlemen upon the other side may say, and however they may intimate, nevertheless I am as true and loyal to-day to the Government of the United States and to the Constitution as the man who sits in the White House, or any man who in an unmanly way makes assertion or innuendo to the contrary.

The gentleman said that he did not mean to cast any reflection upon those gentlemen who voted against the bill passed a few days ago to increase the pensions of widows. Why should he have said anything about that bill in this discussion? Do his acts comport with his words? If he did not mean to cast reproach upon them and hold them up to the condemnation of the "loyal North and West," why did he parade the names of the Southern men who voted against that bill, and have them read from the Clerk's desk? What was that but intended intimidation—a kind of bulldozing proposition?

The time has come, Mr. Chairman, when that sort of a spirit can not prevail and control here. I say to the gentleman from Iowa, and to any one else who wishes to know it, that I mean to vote so long as I am a Representative here as I think proper, and in accordance with the dictates of my conscience, and for what I conceive to be the best interests of my people and the Government.

The Southern people pay a portion of the taxation of this country. They bear at least one-third of the cost of the pensions which are provided by law and paid out to the soldiers of the country. They have heretofore made no complaint about it. They are willing to concede that the Government should pay reasonable pensions to its worthy soldiers, and their representatives vote for proper bills. Inasmuch, therefore, as we do our proper share in the payment of these pensions, have we not a right and should we not be allowed to say how far this thing shall go and to what extent taxation to pay pensions shall be carried?

No part of this money appropriated to pay pensions, or at least no appreciable part, goes to the South. No part, or but little of it, is received by our people. Yet it seems to be a cause of offense if we say that this pension business has gone quite far enough and that the old rate of $8 per month is sufficient and that we wish to stand by that, at least for the present.

Standing behind the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the country there are some gentlemen who, in the abundance of their loyalty and greatness of their patriotism, frequently by innuendo, and sometimes directly, and generally where they have no other refuge, charge that our people so acted as to entail this expense upon the country, and therefore ought not to object to paying for it.

There are two sides of this question. I shall not discuss it. But if you have such sentiments and intentions, if you think that the South ought to have these burdens put upon her, that these ever-increasing appropriations for pensions and other things of which the Southern people get nothing, should be placed upon them by law and by force, and they not allowed to say one word as to the extent and method of levying such exactions, come out plainly and like honorable men and say so; then everybody would understand you. But do not come in the usually unmanly way, that mock fraternal spirit which one moment breathes friendship and love and the next thrusts into our faces the ungracious charge that we by our conduct entailed obligations and debts upon the country which we therefore ought to be willing to bear and to pay. Let us have always the meaning of your charges and the true inwardness of your attacks upon us.

I say it exhibits a want of manliness on the part of gentlemen on the other side to assail us as they think in our helplessness. Much of the disposition to assail us on this floor comes from the fact that you think our people are by circumstances manacled and gagged and unable or unwilling to say anything in reply to the unpatriotic and ungenerous remarks too frequently made against them. It is time, sir, for this thing to stop. For myself I am tired of it. In the South we do our duty as citizens; and if we do not there is a method under the Constitution by which we can be induced to do it. But that method will be found not to run through unkind allusions, ungenerous attacks at delicate points, or assaults upon our pride as men and Americans. The use and suggestion of such methods as I have named are unbecoming brave men and representatives of this country.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that I will not be blamed for mentioning another little matter.

I heard the gentleman from Iowa on yesterday, and it shames me to have heard him say it, for I take it that he was a brave soldier, as he carries his certificate of soldierly conduct upon his body, and I respect a brave man no matter on which side he fought—but I say I was sorry to hear the gentleman in speaking of confederate soldiers say, "I never met them but that they did run away before I got through with them." Valiant soldier! The gentleman must have been a "holy terror," indeed, when he met his enemies.

It is true, my friends, that sometimes we did give way in the varying vicissitudes of that war; yes, we did sometimes run. I have been with the confederate forces when they did run and retreat, and I have been with them again when they were doing their best running with the Federal forces some distance in front making their best possible time. So far, then, honors are about even, but no unkind allusions of that kind ought now ever to be heard. I will not undertake to say which side was right or which wrong during the war. It is neither profitable nor sensible to rake up the events and ashes of the dead past. We have now but one Government and one country, and duty and patriotism teach us that we should maintain them in their integrity. As an humble Representative I am here for the purpose of helping to maintain this Government of our fathers, and to aid in transmitting to our children the goodly heritage of just and equal laws in a Union of equal States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but little to say in regard to the allegations about the Pension Office and General Black's report. General Black is able to take care of himself, I think. As far as his much-abused report is concerned, it may not in some of its parts have been equal to all the tests of rigid requirement; but in the main that he told the truth about the conduct of certain pension officials no honest man can safely deny.

Was not that office conducted in a partisan way? Read, if you please—and I ask to insert it as a part of my remarks—the letter written by Commissioner Dudley to Mr. STEELE of Indiana, the letter read by Mr. MATSON written to one Grubb. Consider the statements contained in the other records and documents read in the hearing of this House bearing upon this matter, and connect them all with the visit and actions of Colonel Dudley, while Commissioner of Pensions, and his subordinates in the State of Ohio, and if any man can say that the Pension Office and pension business of the country were not conducted in a partisan manner, that man does not wish to be convinced.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CABELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have not the slightest objection to the request of the gentleman to put these things upon record, and I hope it will be done; but I will be obliged to the gentleman if he will indicate in his remarks what the subject-matter of the letter and the records may be which he proposes to print.

Mr. CABELL. Simply this: I have not had time to enter upon an extended discussion of this question, because I have given away nearly the whole of the time which was allotted to me for the discussion of the bill. I found that I could not make any speech to the House that would be satisfactory to myself, therefore I have been content to refer in a hurried way to certain points and certain innuendoes as well as charges made by gentlemen against the Southern people. However, the matters to which I particularly alluded were the extracts from the report of the "Warner committee," the letter from Commissioner Dudley to Grubb, and the same Commissioner's letter to Mr. STEELE—to the reading of which some gentleman objected; why I do not know—and which expressed anxiety for Mr. STEELE's election. Now, why an officer of the Government should include in his official letter-book a letter or letters expressive of his anxiety for the election of one candidate for Congress over another, unless he was inspired by partisan zeal, it would be hard to imagine. But I will here, if permitted, give the letter to Mr. STEELE as part of my remarks:

JULY 30, 1884.

MY DEAR FRIEND: It goes without saying that I feel the deepest interest in your success, not only on your own account, but on those of the State, and the Legislature as well. As nearly as I can figure it, there are three members of the Legislature and one Senator in doubt in your district, and I hope that your campaign, and theirs, will be blended so as to be of mutual advantage, as they should be. I will do everything I can to give prompt attention to any calls you may make. I will have letters written with the slips sent by you. Will the prohibition ticket hurt Calkins in your district? If so, in what counties especially?

Very truly yours,

W. W. DUDLEY.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE, Marion, Ind.

In view of the contents of the letter just read, and the contents of the documents and letters read by other gentlemen, was General Black very far wrong in charging partisanship upon his predecessor?

There is one other matter, Mr. Chairman, to which I shall now call attention, and that in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], my colleague upon the committee. However, before I come to that I am reminded of a point made in the course of his speech by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. The gentleman in substance said that a good way to keep faith with the soldiers of the country and to pay and increase pensions would be to continue the internal-revenue system—in other words, to keep up the taxation upon liquors and tobacco.

The gentleman's ideas are suggestive, but they are not new. He evidently appreciates a system from which much money can be raised and paid to his people, but the burdens of which neither he nor they are called upon to bear to any great extent. The internal-revenue system is that from which my people having been trying to escape for many years. It is a system of miserable exactions placed upon the people of this country during the period of war, and which it was promised should be removed as soon as it could be done. But it still remains a reproach to the Government and a wrong upon the people.

The tobacco tax and the tax upon spirits distilled from fruits bear with especial hardship upon the people of my section, and here is a reason, if they had no other, why they would urge the Government, and especially their Representatives, to the exercise of the most rigid economy in the preparation and passage of bills carrying money raised from taxation. It is because our people want to get rid of these burdens that they ask us in voting here to use every exertion to have the heavy hand of taxation taken from them, for the Government has indeed laid a heavy hand upon some of our industries. The voice of the tax-gatherer is heard in the land; and the people simply ask that the hand be lifted and the voice of the tax-gatherer be stilled. You can see, therefore, why we can not vote away lavishly the money in the Treasury. Why we do not want to give away anything that is unnecessary, in the way of pensions or otherwise. That is one reason why the Southern Representatives, I say, are willing to do what is reasonable in the matter of pensions, but they ask you to pause before you ask them to impose the contemplated burdens upon their people when it is not necessary for the safety or welfare of the country.

I now desire to refer to what was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. That gentleman has gone out of the legitimate range of debate to tell the Southern people how wicked they are, what bad methods they pursue, and with what propriety they could amend their ways. We may be obliged to gentlemen who give this kindly advice to us, but when we know their motives, and that they talk of things of which they know nothing, we feel a reasonable degree of incredulity, for which I am satisfied we will be excused. Gentlemen assume to talk of affairs in the South, gathering their information, I suppose, from irresponsible parties, and especially from that miserable set of vampires and vermin who were sent down among us after the war, and who fell upon us with more blighting effect than the locusts and lice of Egypt. You get your coloring from creatures of that character; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], as if he had heard nothing but gospel truth, proceeds to lecture this side of the House, especially the members from the South, upon the wickedness, rapine, bloodshed, and ballot-box stuffing which he is pleased to assign to the Southern section of the country.

Now it is true, Mr. Chairman, that we have had our troubles down South. We have had many difficulties to overcome and many hard problems to solve—these were incident perhaps to the changed condition of affairs in the country.

But I can say, and say it truly, I know nothing of any such occurrences as the gentleman and others like him have laid to our charge. Such things have not taken place in my country. And I speak for that; I speak within my knowledge, and I say all this talk, or a great deal of it, and the stuff you hear from intermeddlers is simply stuff indeed. Many of these harrowing stories from the South have been brought you by creatures that were so miserable that you spewed them out of your own country, and to our great grief they fell down upon us. I have often wondered why they had been made at all, and I could never solve the problem except upon the principle that God Almighty in His infinite wisdom made these creatures to show what sort of a thing He could make in all its horrors and meanness, when He made the carpet-bagger and dropped him down into the Southern States. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] dwells with great persistency upon the lessons learned from his faithful allies, the "carpet-baggers," in regard to "ballot-box stuffing," riots, and disturbances at elections down South. Now I will simply say to friend BUTTERWORTH that I knew he was writhing in the "gall of bitterness," but never before his speech realized that he was so closely bound in the "bonds of iniquity." I never before his speech so fully understood the difficulties that compassed him about, and the election troubles that had overtaken that goodly and godly people from whom he comes.

But is it not a pretty state of affairs and a beautiful spectacle exhibited to this side of the House when with one side of his mouth the gentleman pitches into the Southern people and abuses them for their conduct, and from the other pours out a horrid volume on his own people, which, if true—and I have no right to doubt it—shows beyond all question that if there is meanness and corruption and villainy displayed in elections in any country on God's green earth it is in the State of Ohio, and especially in the city of Cincinnati, of which that gentleman seems so proud? I say to the gentleman first cast the beams out the eyes of your own people before you look after the motes in ours. Go sweep around your own door; you will find ample employment. Mend the bad methods of your own country before you undertake to lecture other people upon political morality.

Mr. Chairman, the time which I reserved to myself is I think about exhausted. I have no more discussed the bill before the House than have others who preceded me. I have only endeavored to call attention to some matters which I think our friends on both sides ought to know and consider. These bitter partisan discussions ought to cease. I am glad to know that they are never precipitated by gentlemen from my section. Our Southern Representatives are here in accordance with the will and the rights of their people. We wish simply in a becoming way to discharge the trusts with which we are charged. For myself, I repeat that as long as I am here I intend to do my duty, so help me God, as I see and understand it uninfluenced by threat or promise. With proper caution we can all do our duty here in a manner agreeable to each other and profitable to the country. The troubles of the past should have no place in this House. The war with all its bitter memories has long been over, and the vile specters of discord and unnatural strife should no longer be paraded before Congress and the country. Let the two sections of the country come together, the better by reason of the discord which lately prevailed between them, and renewed in their attachment to the union of the States and the Constitution of our fathers. And let us as Representatives do our part toward allaying all difficulties and healing all differences, and stand forth as men and patriots in the glorious endeavor to make this Government what God and nature intended it should be—the grandest Republic on the face of the earth.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] to say he only intended to use forty minutes of his time; he has used forty-seven minutes.

Mr. CABELL. I must call then for the rest of the time to which I was entitled, having promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE].

Mr. CABELL. I yield what time I have to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to ask unanimous consent to print some document or letter. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not submitted any request from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] as to the printing of any paper. Has the gentleman from Virginia any such request that he desires to have submitted?

Mr. CABELL. I simply requested to put into my remarks the letter I referred to.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the request to be of that nature, and have no objection if the same privilege be extended to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CABELL. I did not formally ask permission, but proposed to include it in my remarks. I simply ask leave to print the letter referred to as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that the Chair can not couple the two requests together. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to print a letter which he referred to in his remarks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not object if the same permission is given to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If it can be modified so that the letters proposed to be printed by both gentlemen can go in I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now ask unanimous consent that the letters presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] may be printed in the RECORD.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENLEY. That consent has just been refused on the other side to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg pardon.

Mr. HAMMOND. As they objected on that side, we now object on this.

Mr. DUNHAM. We did not object.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No one objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to understand whether permission has been given to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] to print the letter to which he has referred here?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not; objection was made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not object.

Mr. DAVIS. Nobody on this side objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allowed me I can not deliver the remarks which I had intended to make upon the subject under discussion; but if an opportunity offers on Saturday I hope to submit some figures to show that every statement made by Commissioner Black in his report is more than sustained by the record. That fact will be made plain hereafter—if not in this debate, then I trust by the investigation which is to be made by the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. I only regret that in the brief time allowed me it is impossible to present the facts. I had hoped that on this anniversary of the inauguration of a Democratic President I would have an opportunity to show that every pledge made by his administration has been carried out, so far as it was possible to carry it out in the first year, and that especially had those pledges been made good in the management of the branch of the Government which has been under discussion here for the last three or four days.

The President was most fortunate in selecting the distinguished gentleman now at the head of the Pension Office to manage that bureau. That gentleman is not the man described by my friend from Iowa—one who would "strike his comrades in arms with a mailed hand." On the contrary, during the time he has been in office he has signed his name to more certificates granting pensions to his comrades than were ever signed in the same length of time by any of his predecessors, and has managed that office as a business institution in the interests of the soldiers of the country.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, it would have been more agreeable to me personally, as I doubt not it would have been to both sides of the House, had this bill, about the provisions of which there is no controversy, been so presented here as not to have precipitated this discussion, which has covered the whole field of partisan politics, and has been already so protracted as, doubtless, to have wearied the House and the country. During my service in Congress I have never found it pleasant to engage in bitter partisan discussion upon the floor of the House, and I shall now indulge in no partisan discussion beyond a brief reference to some things that have been said by gentlemen upon the other side. If there be any member upon this floor whose heart is free from sectional prejudice it is myself. In all my service here I have refrained from saying one word that might wound the feelings of any man, no matter what may have been his relation to the Government in the past.

The country will not be surprised, Mr. Chairman, at the 66 votes that were cast here against the bill to increase the pension of the widows of our soldiers, but it may be somewhat amazed at the vociferous sensitiveness displayed upon this floor by the gentlemen who cast those votes. It will strike the people as exceedingly strange that it should be offensive to those gentlemen to kindly refer to that vote or even to have it read from the Clerk's desk. The hundreds and thousands of Union soldiers in the North, in whose breasts there does not linger a single trace of unkindly feeling toward the men who opposed them upon more than a hundred battlefields, will be pained to learn that their old comrade [Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa] who left his leg upon the battlefield in defending his adopted country, for no other offense under heaven than kindly maintaining his rights and theirs upon this floor, has been the victim of greater abuse and more bitter ridicule than any other member of Congress in the last quarter of a century. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], to whose speech I listened not only with pleasure but admiration, was kind enough to carry us back to the period of strife in order to make the suggestion that that unfortunate rebellion had been suppressed more by the Democrats of the country than by any other class of our people.

It is not very material here to discuss whether those who participated in the war for the preservation of the nation's life belonged to one party or another. But I have impressed on my mind vividly some of the events and incidents of that unhappy period, and, until recently, I had supposed that Republicans and the Republican party had something to do with suppressing the rebellion. Just how we shall ascertain the relative number of Republicans and Democrats who participated in that conflict on behalf of the Union I do not clearly know. The only official information upon that subject which now recurs to my mind is that with reference to the vote for governor in the State of Ohio in 1863. A man named Vallandigham, whose loyalty was so seriously questioned that he was exiled, was deemed by the Democratic party of that State a fit person to become its standard-bearer for the highest office in the gift of the people of that great Commonwealth. The soldier vote cast on that occasion, as nearly as I now recall, was about 2,000 for Mr. Vallandigham and upward of 41,000 for the Republican candidate, Mr. Brough.

But I repeat, it is not very material for us now to undertake to ascertain whether it was this party or that to which the Union soldiery at that time belonged. For myself, I do all honor to every Democrat who went into that contest. I went into it in obedience to the call of my country—in obedience to what seemed to me an imperative patriotic duty. Not only my duty called me there, but my party associations were such as to bid me go. There was no credit in my going under such circumstances unless it be that credit which ought to be accorded to every man who tries to do his duty under all circumstances. Party association, party influence over the individual member of a political organization is almost supreme. It too often leads us into the path of error when we are almost unconscious of its influence. So that when the Democrat of that period went into the war to preserve the life of the nation, he demonstrated that his love of country was stronger than his party allegiance; and he is far more entitled to credit than am I, whose political associations all impelled me to go.

But, sir, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] was kind enough in his very interesting speech to advert to the act of 1879, providing arrears of pensions for the Union soldiery of the country; and he said he wanted to afflict somebody on this side with something he had to say on that subject. So far as I recollect that is the only law of general beneficence to the masses of the Union soldiery that has been passed during the long years of Democratic ascendency here. We all recollect very well and very clearly, however, that since that time the Democratic press of the country, Democratic stump orators, and Democratic statesmen have pointed to that great act of beneficence with pride. All honor to the Democratic party whenever it does right! He would be an extremely selfish and mean man who would not accord so much to a party that so rarely does right. [Laughter and applause.]

But, sir, I am unwilling to let the occasion pass without reminding our friends on the other side that they are arrogating to themselves rather too much when they undertake to appropriate the entire credit of passing that law. Early in that session of the Forty-fifth Congress—in April, 1878—a Republican member of this body from the State of Iowa [Mr. Cummings] introduced that bill. It went before a Democratic committee, and there it had sweet repose from that day to this. The 19th day of June rolled around, and we heard nothing from the bill. On that day my late lamented colleague [Mr. Haskell], being entitled to the floor for a motion to suspend the rules, presented that bill to the House for consideration and moved its passage under a suspension of the rules. There was no alternative except to vote upon it; and in that way a vote was secured, and the bill was passed. The vote upon that measure was, according to the RECORD, 169 in favor of it and 61 against it. The Democratic vote for it was 48, and the Democratic vote against it 61; so if the measure had rested exclusively upon the Democratic vote cast there would have been a majority against it and the bill would have been defeated. It took 150 votes to carry that measure under a suspension of the rules, of which the Republicans supplied 116 and the Democrats 48; and not a solitary Republican voted against it. Just how much credit our Democratic friends can take to themselves under such circumstances I leave for the country to determine.

Subsequently, February 3, 1879, an effort was made to make provision for the payment of these arrears of pensions; and Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, a Republican, presented a bill for that purpose. It was submitted under a suspension of the rules. The total vote was 140 in the affirmative and 81 in the negative. Of those who voted for it there were but 28 Democrats, while every vote against it was a Democratic vote. Republicans supplied 112 of those 140 votes. The bill failed for the want of the necessary two-thirds vote. Two weeks later the Committee on Appropriations reported a bill and offered it to the House under a suspension of the rules appropriating $25,000,000 to pay arrears and $1,800,000 for ordinary pensions. The vote upon that proposition stood 183 for the bill and 67 against it. Sixty-two Democrats voted for it and 67 Democrats against it, the majority of the Democratic votes cast being against it. It took 177 votes to carry it, of which the Republicans supplied 121.

If it had been left to that Democratic vote the proposition to vote twenty-five millions of money to pay the arrears that were due under the law which had been already passed would have been defeated. In fact, a majority of all the Democratic votes cast were against it.

In the next Congress I do not know of anything occurring of material importance relative to pensions. Nor do I myself undertake to affirm or deny the attitude of that House toward the Union soldiers. I shall leave that entirely to the testimony of a distinguished Democratic Representative who then occupied a seat on this floor. When appealed to by one of his constitutent soldiers to secure him Congressional relief he replied as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Your favor was duly received. I would myself cheerfully introduce and urge the passage of a bill such as you suggest, but with the present Democratic House pension bills do not have much favor. It has become almost impossible to get consideration for such a bill at all, and when considered its chance of passing the House is very remote. The rebel general who is at the head of the Pension Committee in the Senate is still more averse to allowing any such bills to pass. It would not be at all probable therefore the bill will be got through. I will confer with your brother, and if he thinks there is anything in the matter, I will very cordially act in the matter.

Very truly,

F. E. BELTZHOOVER.

E. W. CURRIDEN, Esq.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one minute?

Mr. RYAN. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. I only wish to say that I understand Mr. Beltzhoover always denied the authorship of that letter.

Mr. RYAN. I am willing to give Mr. Beltzhoover the benefit of that denial in the RECORD.

In the last Congress the Mexican pension bill was brought before the House under a suspension of the rules, without opportunity of amendment and with only thirty minutes for debate. While the House was almost unanimously favorable to the bill there was undeniably a strong sentiment to so amend it as to afford relief to some extent to the Union soldiers who were and still are in the main wholly unprovided for. Nevertheless the bill passed the House with very little opposition, 227 votes having been cast for it and only 46 against it. Subsequently, during the same Congress, this bill was returned to the House with certain Senate amendments which provided, first, that Union soldiers who had served a certain period of time and who had no other means of support except their daily labor, if suffering a disability incurred by no fault of their own, incapacitating them for labor, should be put upon the pension-roll. Secondly, that the soldier's widow should have a pension of $12 a month instead of $8 as was provided by existing law. Third, that the minor child of a deceased soldier entitled to a pension under existing law up to the age of sixteen years should have the right to continue to enjoy such pension if of unsound mind so long as such unfortunate condition should exist. Fourth, that the widow of a soldier who was on the pension-roll when he died should be entitled to a pension in her own right, whether the husband died of disease or injuries contracted in the service or not.

No fair-minded man will pretend to deny that these Senate amendments were not only just but were responsive to a high obligation resting upon the Government to extend such relief. The Democrats were then largely in the majority in the House. On motion of General Keifer, from Ohio, who had been Speaker of the Forty-seventh Congress, and who was then a Republican member of the House, on January 5, 1885, to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the Senate amendments, the RECORD shows the vote to have been 129 for and 85 against the motion. Of the number voting for the bill 46 only were Democrats, and all who voted against it were Democrats excepting one Republican from the State of Florida. Of the 129 votes cast for the bill 82 were Republicans. Of all the Democratic votes cast 38 majority were against the bill. Of all the Democrats voting in the negative 2 only voted against the original bill when it originally passed the House, showing clearly that the objection of those voting against the bill rested wholly upon their hostility to the Senate amendments for the benefit of the Union soldiers.

It required two-thirds of all the votes cast to pass the bill. In other words it required 143 votes to pass it, and as it received but 129 votes the bill failed. Let it be borne in mind that of the 191 Democratic members of that House only 46 of them voted to pass the bill with the Senate amendments. The bill failed for want of the necessary two-thirds vote. Repeated efforts during the remainder of that session to bring the bill and Senate amendments before the House for consideration, subject to a majority vote, were persistently and successfully antagonized exclusively by Democrats, and by such extraordinary and revolutionary methods as are commonly denominated filibustering. But for such Democratic hostility in that House to the little relief for the Union soldiers provided for in the Senate amendments the Mexican pension bill would then have become a law, and those old veterans would now be enjoying their just dues from the Government whose flag they so gallantly maintained in a foreign land.

During the present session, and only a few weeks ago, a little pension bill was brought before this body for consideration under a suspension of the rules, increasing the pensions of soldiers' widows from eight to twelve dollars per month. The record shows the vote on that bill to have been 198 for it and 66 against it. Of the 198 votes for it only 79 were Democrats, and all who voted against it were Democrats. It required 176 votes to pass that little bill, of which the Republican members on this floor supplied 119. Of the 183 Democratic members of this body only 79 could be mustered to cast their votes in favor of this little relief for the widow of the soldier who died of injuries received in the service for the preservation of the nation's existence. Such has been the attitude of the Democratic party toward the Union soldier in Congress during all its long years of ascendency in the lower House since the war.

The one objection, frivolous enough it seems to me, they urged against this little increase of the widows' pensions was that the Republican party itself in 1862 fixed the rate at $8. There is this force in that objection: that presumptively the action of a Republican Congress is correct. At the time, 1862, when the rate of $8 per month was fixed it should be borne in mind that the country was impoverished both by the maladministration of the Democratic party during its many years of power preceding 1861 and by the civil war then being waged with all the fury and energies of both sides. We were then not only without money, but the resources of the Government were taxed to the uttermost to maintain our armies in the field. We were wholly dependent upon the public credit. We were incurring an indebtedness approximating one hundred million dollars per day. No wisdom could then forecast the duration of the conflict. It could not be foreseen what might be the result, nor what the burden upon and the condition of the people when the last gun should be fired.

Under such circumstances did the Republican party in Congress declare the rate of the widows' pension should be $8 per month. Twenty-four years have since elapsed. In the past twenty years our prosperity has been unexampled. It has doubled upon the wealth of all our previous existence as a nation. The great public debt of over $3,000,000,000 has diminished until it is no longer a matter of grave public concern. Our resources are inexhaustible and our possibilities of wealth and power almost illimitable. That widow has now become aged, infirm, and alas, in too many cases, impoverished. Then who shall say that it is wrong or unjust, under existing conditions, to increase her pension beyond what it was the ability of the country to provide when the rate was fixed at $8 per month?

It will be seen how utterly frivolous is that objection so persistently urged in defense of the 66 votes against the measure. As for myself, without intending any reflection whatever upon the patriotism of any party or any man, I regard the Democratic party wholly without capacity to make provision for the performance of the nation's obligations to the men, their widows, orphans, and dependent relatives to whom we are indebted for our existence as a nation to-day. It is equally, in my judgment, without capacity to crystallize into law any great public policy for the welfare of sixty millions of people. Its incapacity springs chiefly from the inharmonious and incongruous elements which enter into its composition. It is hopelessly divided upon all great public questions—the tariff, the currency, and the soldier.

No sooner was it apparent that the bill introduced by me at the present session to remove the limitation from the arrears-of-pension law was about to be favorably reported from the committee than the distinguished Democratic leaders of this body put their heads together to thwart it, and to this end they solicited the present Commissioner of Pensions to make an estimate of the amount of money that the bill would take from the Treasury, and although that estimate from the Commissioner contained admittedly an exaggeration of $80,000,000, the estimate was blazoned everywhere before the people by the press, without correction, in order to create a public sentiment against the measure. The attitude of the daily Democratic organ here at the capital of the nation at once became aggressively hostile, and boldly declared against all further legislation for the benefit of the Union soldier in a very elaborate editorial, concluding as follows:

> The time has come for answering with a decided negative every proposition to increase the pension charges of the Government, whether the proposition is inspired by demagogism or corruption. Congress has done its full duty by the soldier; let it now turn its endeavor to doing its full duty to the people.

I am nevertheless hopeful that the Republicans of this body may be able to join with themselves a sufficient number of Democrats to pass the bill when it comes before the House, as I trust it will at an early day.

With such a record no one need misapprehend the situation. He would be indifferent or ignorantly credulous indeed who in the face of such a record would still be willing to intrust the guardianship of the Union soldier to the Democratic party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I find I must proceed very rapidly in order to reach anything like the line of argument I intended to submit.

In the last Congress, at the opening of the first session, I introduced a bill to remove the limitation from the arrears-of-pension law. That was favorably reported by the committee, but we were never able to reach it for consideration. Again, at the beginning of this session, I introduced the same bill, and, as already stated, it has been reported favorably by the committee of this House.

Now, I desire to say a word in reference to that measure. I offered that bill because it appeared to me that the limitation in the law of 1879 was exceedingly unjust. Why should there be such an invidious discrimination? Is the obligation of the Government greater to the four hundred thousand who applied prior to July 1, 1880, than to the one hundred and fifty thousand who have filed their applications since? Have the latter less merit than the former? On the contrary, we are advised the records will show they are of equal merit.

It would be strange if they were not of greater merit, in view of the increased difficulty of procuring proof and the improved methods and increased vigilance employed in adjudicating claims. Did they not all alike respond to the same call to duty? Did they not all alike leave their homes amid tears, every one of which was a drop of blood from the heart of love, every one of which to them was a jewel more precious than any that ever adorned a royal diadem? Did they not all alike, in the language of the report made upon the bill I introduced last Congress, perform the same service, fight the same enemy, follow the same flag, experience the same privations, endure the same horrors of the same Andersonville hell, suffer from similar wounds and diseases in the same war and under the same laws? [Applause.]

It is said the obligation of the Government toward the Union soldier is written in the law. It could not be clearer or stronger than the obligation implied. The dismemberment of the Union was sought upon a principle that would divide it into as many petty nations as there might be diversity of interest; each a constant prey to the caprice and cupidity of greater powers, always exposed to conflicts with each other, each compelled to maintain a standing army and a powerful navy; all sorely oppressed by the most burdensome taxation, and the people always subjected to influences that breed poverty and ignorance. [Applause].

Such a calamity was only averted by the sufferings and blood and valor of these heroes; and instead we have the greatest Republic on the earth, an inseparable Union, holding high over the sister nations the torch of liberty which lights the world; a people the happiest and most prosperous on the habitable globe. This is our heritage, ours to enjoy and ours to transmit.

This is our glorious estate, bought by their sufferings, their blood, and their manhood. What is the measure of the obligation imposed upon us? Shall we stand like ingrates unworthy of our citizenship, and instead of warming the cold and feeding the starving veteran content ourselves with bathing him in a sea of rhetorical glory? Shall we reply to his appeal for justice, for the performance of our solemn obligations, "Oh, yes; we owe all we have to you; but we are free-traders, and that policy calls for a reduction of customs duties, and that will so reduce the revenue that we find ourselves unable to respect our obligations to you."

I fully agree that taxation should never exceed the minimum consistent with the highest public good. Just what that is is the great problem, the correct solution of which requires a high order of statesmanship. I will not discuss that question here further than to say that a scale of taxation that leaves the Government powerless to discharge obligations incurred in preserving the nation's life is a reproach to any people.

It is estimated that one hundred thousand men who fought and suffered for the flag in the late war, now old and infirm, broken in health, indigent, many of them, and their families cold and hungry, are unable to furnish the technical proofs required to establish their right to a pension. Shall we make provision for their relief? The nation's faith is pledged. Shall that be violated? Could any other form of repudiation be more odious? Could the national honor remain unsullied and patriotism among the people, upon whom after all depends the perpetuity of the Republic, find any invigorating nourishment in such ingratitude? Then, sir, any scale of taxation that does not respect such obligations is not only a national stigma but contains the germ of national decay. The poor man, my friend from West Virginia describes as borne down by taxation so insidious that he is not conscious of the oppression, will prefer to endure the ills of that taxation of which he is so entirely unconscious rather than to be relieved of it at the peril of being driven from employment into the horrors of hopeless mendicancy.

Any reduction of taxation that drives men from the mines, the forges, and the workshops in a hopeless search for bread is a national crime. You tell us of men all over the country unemployed, and vociferously demand a scaling of customs duties; but will you afford them relief by a reduction of taxation that will increase their number tenfold? You tell us that agriculture is not sufficiently profitable, but a reduction of taxation that diminishes the consumption and increases the production, that destroys the market and multiplies production, augments the evil of which you complain. Then, I repeat, if we do not go slow, let us go sure, cautiously, and wisely about the delicate task of reducing the public revenues lest we put in peril the public prosperity and the national honor. [Applause.]

In conclusion I call attention to the following extract from the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions presented to this House last Tuesday:

> The bill introduced December 21, 1885, by Mr. RYAN, and read twice and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is as follows:
> "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, chapter 187, entitled, 'An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes,' be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:
> "'SEC. 2. That all pensions which have been or which may hereafter be granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, if the disability occurred prior to discharge, and if such disability occurred after the discharge, then from the date of actual disability, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension; and in the consideration of any and all claims for pension in consequence of death from or for disability resulting from disease contracted in the service during the late civil war, the person on whose account the said pension is claimed shall be presumed prima facie to have been sound and free from disease at the date of entering the service.'"
> "SEC. 2. That all pensions which have been granted by special acts of Congress for wounds, injuries, or diseases received or contracted in the military service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion shall commence at and be computed from the time of the discharge of the person to whom the pension was granted, unless the disability for which the pension was granted occurred after the discharge of the person, and in that case the pension shall begin from the date of disability; and in all cases the pension shall be computed under and be subject to the conditions and limitations of the general pension laws."
> The section of the act of March 3, 1879, cited above, provided that the benefits of the prior act of January 25, 1879, granting arrears of pensions, should only apply to claims filed on or before June 30, 1880. The chief object of the bill under consideration is to remove this limitation and extend the benefits of the provision in question to such valid claims as may have been filed since June 30, 1880, as well as all which may hereafter be presented and allowed. The limitation referred to is a practical and unjust discrimination in favor of a portion of our maimed and disabled soldiers and their dependent relatives and against another portion equally meritorious and equally deserving.
> * * * * * * * *
> In those dark hours, when the Government was appealing to its loyal citizens to preserve it from dissolution, it stood pledged by a statute (section 1659, Revised Statutes), that—
> "If any person, whether officer or soldier, belonging to the militia of any State, and called out into the service of the United States, be wounded or disabled while in actual service, he shall be taken care of and provided for at the public expense."
> This was a sacred obligation entered into on the part of the United States with every soldier who enlisted to put down the rebellion, and was just as binding on the country as though its authorities had delivered to the soldier when he enlisted a bond to that effect, and when the soldier held up his hand and took the oath required at enlistment and signed his name to the rolls he subscribed to that contract; on his part he promised to do all in his power to maintain the integrity of the Government on the condition that if he were wounded or otherwise disabled the Government should care for him and those near and dear who were dependent upon him at the public expense. Most loyally did the brave men who shed their blood on the thousand battlefields, made over memorable by their gallantry and devotion, keep their part of the contract. They did maintain the integrity of the Government; they did save their country from disruption and destruction, and they now ask that that Government shall not ignore its part of that contract. They ask to be put on an equal footing with the bondholder, whose securities were indorsed with their blood and given value by their sufferings. They did not get their claims against the Government at 40 cents on the dollar, but paid full value in sufferings and sacrifices.

Happily the country is prosperous and its revenues ample, and while such a favorable condition of affairs affords no warrant for ill-considered bounties or the payment of questionable claims, it must be remembered that we are indebted for our prosperity and for the preservation of the Government itself to the valor and sufferings and sacrifices of the brave and loyal men in whose behalf this measure of justice is invoked.

* * * * * * *

We can but conclude from a careful investigation of the matter that $150,000,000 would be a liberal estimate of the amount to be paid under the repeal of the limitation, and that that amount would be distributed over a series of years, the greatest possible amount in one year not exceeding $50,000,000.

The ability of the country to meet the payment of this sum, vast as it is, no one questions. When the war closed, the Government was paying an annual interest of over $150,000,000. This interest payment alone is nearly $100,000,000 less annually than it was then. During the twenty years that have elapsed since the close of the war, nearly $3,000,000,000 have been paid for interest, and more than eleven hundred millions have been paid on the national debt, while but one-quarter of the amount paid for interest alone has been paid in pensions. Three billions of dollars for the use of money borrowed to carry on the war, and less than $750,000,000 for the lives and the limbs, the sufferings and sacrifices, the desolated homes, the widows and the fatherless children of the brave men who surrendered all their bright hopes of earthly happiness to defend and save their country! The citizen who presented $400 in gold of his easily-earned wealth at the Treasury Department in 1864 received therefor a Government bond for $1,000 drawing 6 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually in gold. If from a feeling of patriotism he had declined to present his coupons until the present time, he would not be told that the statute of limitation had rendered his bond worthless, but he would receive the full amount of that bond and of all the coupons attached thereto. Every honest citizen points with pride to the fact that his Government has promptly and faithfully met every bonded obligation; that not only the letter but the spirit of the law, as construed by the most exacting creditor, has been literally fulfilled.

The debt due the wounded and disabled soldiers, their widows and their fatherless children, should be as sacred as any Government bond, and should be treated with equal justice. The passage of the bill could not in any way lessen the wealth of the country, for the money paid out under its provisions would all be received by a needy and meritorious class of our own citizens.

This bill further provides that the person on whose account the pension is claimed shall be presumed to have been sound and free from disease at the date of entering the service. He will still be required to prove that his disability originated in the service as heretofore. When that fact is established by competent proof the claimant should not be required to go back of his enlistment to prove that he was a sound man. It ought to be sufficient that his disability is pensionable, and that it was contracted in the service while in the line of duty.

These are the material facts which bring him within the scope of his contract with the Government and entitle him to all of its benefits. Besides, in equity, the Government should be estopped from demanding proof of soundness at the time of enlistment, when by its own chosen agents it declared him to be sound, and accepted him into its service, unless they can clearly show that the soldier induced the enlisting officer to accept him by the practice of fraud and deception. Nor does the proposed provision weaken the safeguards which are now thrown around the present system; such is the amplitude of proof required by the Department, and so thorough is the system of testing the veracity of witnesses and their knowledge of the facts to which they depose, that it is most difficult at this late day—twenty years after the war—for the meritorious to establish their claims, while cases of doubtful merit are almost impossible of admission to the benefit of the pension laws. Your committee are satisfied that under the present system there is the minimum of fraud to be apprehended. It is not to be defended upon any principle of justice, nor upon anything in the nature of the obligation of the Government, that the meritorious claimant should be denied a pension from the date of his pensionable disability if it occurred after his discharge, and from the date of his discharge if it occurred before.

Your committee recommend that the following proviso be added to the first section of the bill:

"Provided, That application has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day of January, 1888, otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the application."

Believing that this bill as amended is right in principle and justified by sound public policy, that under its operations merited benefits would accrue to many thousands of citizens who are justly entitled to all the consideration that it is in the power of Congress to bestow upon them, and that no public interest can possibly suffer therefrom, your committee most heartily and earnestly recommend the passage of this bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. RYAN. I yield five minutes——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask how that time is calculated, whether the time consumed by the gentleman from Kansas is deducted from an hour or from three-quarters of an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thanks the gentleman for his suggestion. The Chair had forgotten that fifteen minutes of the time of the gentleman from Kansas had already been exhausted.

Mr. RYAN. Yes; I was only entitled to forty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is twelve minutes of that time remaining.

Mr. RYAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. BURROWS. I must decline to yield the floor if this is to come out of the time allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to state that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to state that I am unwilling that the opposition any gentleman may make to the publication of the letter to which I have referred in my remarks shall be used as a basis for objecting to the request of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BURROWS. This, of course, does not come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rose to a question of privilege, and supposed that I could make it as well now as at any other time, and it was my desire to make it before the debate proceeded further.

Mr. HAMMOND. For one I want to say, Mr. Chairman, being under the impression that an objection was made on the other side to the printing requested by the gentleman from Virginia, I made objection to a request from that side. I have been informed that no such objection was made and want to withdraw mine.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the consent of the House that the gentleman from Virginia may have the privilege of printing the letter which he desires; and I do not want him deterred in any wise, or to be entangled by any childish opposition that any member may make to the publication of the letter which I desired to have the right to print.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] have permission to publish the letter to which reference has been made.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] have permission to print the letter he has referred to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The letter my colleague desires to have published is a personal one, and the question of veracity is raised. I ask to have it read, and object to its being printed unless I have an opportunity to comment upon it.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not rise to participate in this debate, but only to make a statement, that the facts of history may not be misrepresented. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] the other day took occasion to say:

I appeal to the history of the last Democratic administration, and ask the Clerk to read a letter written by Howell Cobb, when Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a request by an official in his Department that he might go to his home and make political speeches.

And thereupon the gentleman from Georgia had the letter of Howell Cobb read. He then said:

Such was the language of the Democratic party when it was heretofore in power. Having given publicity to that piece of Democratic history, which the conduct of the Republican party has caused the world to forget for twenty-five years, I desire to say no more upon that line.

Following that line I desire to say this: I hold in my hand the report of the Covode investigating committee. A passage from that report is as follows:

In this connection your committee would fail in their duty did they not call the attention of the House to the custom proved to exist, and with the knowledge of the President, of allowing officers employed under the Government to be absent on leave from their posts, and employed in electioneering for the party to which they belong. Gideon G. Westcott is a notable illustration of this practice. In 1856, being then an appraiser in the custom-house at Philadelphia, he was "absent on leave, in the State central committee-room," some four months; during which time he rendered no service to the Government, yet received his regular salary. The practice has also prevailed in the New York and other custom-houses, of appointing men temporarily for the week preceding the election, and granting them leave of absence, that they might devote themselves to electioneering duties.

Turning then to the testimony of the gentleman referred to, I find it is as follows:

Gideon G. Westcott called and sworn.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. My family reside in Philadelphia.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. I am a merchant.
Q. Were you an appraiser in the custom-house at Philadelphia during the time from 1853 to 1857?
A. I was an appraiser during General Pierce's term, which, I believe, extended over that period.
Q. Were you the postmaster at Philadelphia after that time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. During the time you were appraiser were you absent from your official duties from June to November, 1856?

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURROWS. Not now.

A. I asked leave of absence from the Department, which was the only leave of absence I had during the term of my office as appraiser, and I think that in July it was granted to me. During all the period of my leave of absence I was in Philadelphia and reported myself daily to the collector.
Q. What was your occupation during the time of your absence?
A. I was serving upon the Democratic central committee during part of the day.
Q. Did you receive your regular salary during that period?
A. Yes, sir. I do not think it was more than three months that I was absent.
Q. How and from whom did you receive it?
A. It was paid at the custom-house.
Q. In the regular way?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was this done with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Brown, the collector?
A. Well, Mr. Brown certainly had the knowledge that I had leave of absence, because he knew that I was prepared at all times, in case of any press of business, to come there.
Q. Did he know that you were not rendering any service in the custom-house during that time?
A. That I can not say; I took it for granted that he knew it, because I saw Mr. Brown every day. He was in the State central committee room himself, more or less, every day.
Q. Who is it that grants the leave of absence?
A. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Howell Cobb. [Laughter.]

Q. You had written to the Secretary of the Treasury?
A. Certainly; I had made a formal application to him for leave of absence.
Q. And had got leave from him?
A. Yes, sir.

I close with the language of the gentleman from Georgia modified slightly:

Such was the practice of the Democratic party when it was heretofore in power.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow me a moment or two?

Mr. RYAN. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. RYAN. I ask permission of the House to print in my remarks some extracts from the report of the committee on the pension bill to which I referred.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. RYAN. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask the gentleman to yield to me just half a minute.

Mr. RYAN. I promised the gentleman from Iowa all the rest of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It was not my purpose to participate further in this debate when I last yielded the floor, nor have I time now for even a brief review of much that I would be glad to discuss. But it seems I hit somewhere pretty hard, for I have been treated to a constant fusillade of abuse since this debate began. I do not regret, therefore, that I did what I did, since that which I did, provoking these attacks, was to quote from the official records of this House the solid vote of the Gulf States against the widows' pension bill. But I am told that I have brought on a political debate on a pension appropriation bill. I deny it, Mr. Chairman. I think I made it apparent in my opening remarks that the whole management of this appropriation bill opened up politics upon a scale gigantic and effective to reach political ends according to the views of the Democracy.

Not that alone. Do these gentlemen expect that the report from Commissioner Black, which was conceived and published with no other motive than to make it a Democratic campaign document, could, by men of honesty and with a spark of courage, be allowed to pass unnoticed upon this floor? Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman in charge of the bill, my colleague upon the committee, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, devoted two columns and a half of his speech to a discussion of the legitimate elements of the bill, and gave eight columns in his speech, according to the RECORD, to the wide range of the debate wholly outside of the provisions of the bill. And must we remain silent in the presence of every Democratic battery trained in the interests of that party and be condemned if we raise our voices in reply? For one I have no apologies to make. Why not have this discussion on this bill as well as upon any other? This delay works no hardship to the soldier. It is not an urgency deficiency bill; it is the regular pension appropriations bill for the year ending June 30, 1887, and does not come into operation until the end of the year ending June 30, 1886.

I say that it is the regular appropriation bill, and does not go into operation until after June 30, 1886. No soldier is injured by the delay resulting from this debate. No citizen is injured by it. And with all the giant minds of the Democracy exercising their skill and power to "buck and gag" the Committee on Invalid Pensions by means of the work of the Appropriation Committee, and with a report from the Commissioner of Pensions involving politics more truckling and dirty than was ever sent out in a political campaign document by a campaign committee, I for one will not remain silent.

But, Mr. Chairman, what points have been disproved that I laid down in the opening of this debate? Not one. We have been treated to much elegant sport. The buffoon has taken the place of the statesman, and I have been ridiculed before the country by the wit and genius of Southern chivalry. I can stand it. It is thrown in my teeth that I first drew breath within sight of Ben Lomond. That is true, Mr. Chairman; but while it is true that I represent in my birth the land of the thistle, I want to tell the gentleman that "from lowland moor to highland pass" treason never found birth in a Scottish heart. [Applause on the Republican side.] True it is that I was born in Scotland. True it is that a little child I came to America. Does it remain for a simple Scottish boy of twenty-one, not born under the folds of the beautiful flag of America, to teach patriotism to a gentleman who was born upon American soil? [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, if I am recognized, I will yield of my reserved time fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would be glad if I had the time to follow the remarks of more than one gentleman. I have been assailed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] because of my allusion to the other world in comparing my opinion of the Northern copperhead with my estimate of the ex-confederate who placed his bosom in front of my weapon in testimony of his convictions.

I said then, and I repeat it now, that I respect the ex-confederate for his courage, while for the copperhead, who hissed behind our backs while bullets hissed in front, I have not language to express my contempt. [Applause on the Republican side.] When I say "copperhead" I do not say "Democrat." No, sir. I fought side by side with Democrats. They went side by side with us into every danger to save the Union. There is not a soldier in the North but knows the distinction between a Democrat and a copperhead. That distinction I want to keep clear and plain.

Mr. HANBACK. We called them "war Democrats."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But why, Mr. Chairman, should the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] be the only one to rise and take exception to my remark? It was not aimed at him. It was aimed at the ex-confederate soldiers, and I see by the gentleman's own record that from 1861 to 1865 he filled a comfortable State office and never exposed himself to Federal lead. [Laughter.]

I did not apply my remark to him, and may his mind rest in peace! [Laughter.] This morning I have been assailed by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CABELL] as being "unmanly" and a "bulldozer." Ah, my fellow-citizens and friends, that is not my reputation at home, and it remains for a member of Congress from the historic and bloody streets of Danville, Va., to howl "bulldozer" at me. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CABELL. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield not a moment. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. CABELL. I knew you would not yield for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Give me the time and I will yield. I did it the other day. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I recognize with pleasure the gentlemanly and manly character of some of my opponents in this debate. I take pleasure in recognizing in that way the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and the cultivated and eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who spent four years of his life in the confederate service. That gentleman drew a picture beautiful, touching, and instructive, of three brothers, all nursed at the same breast, fighting on opposing fields, and yet no barrier between their hearts.

I, too, Mr. Chairman, will attempt to draw "a family picture" if I have the same permission. Three brothers of us met together one night in 1861, under the old family roof, and agreed that in this great land of our adoption the hour had come for us to lay our lives at the feet of our common country. We slept none that night; all sat up. In the morning, before parting, the old father [turning to Mr. NORWOOD], born in Scotland, too, took down the old family Bible [again turning to Mr. NORWOOD], brought from Scotland, and after reading it, knelt among his little group of Scottish-American children, prayed to the God of nations to guard us and make us brave for the right, finished his prayer, and said amen.

The parting you gentlemen have nothing to do with; but those three brothers, "all nursed at the same breast" and "with no barrier between their hearts," went side by side to the war, all, however, fighting on the same side—the side of their country. The eldest, Thomas, fell, shot through the heart, in the deadly "Hornet's Nest" of Shiloh, and he now sleeps in an unmarked grave by the quiet waters of the Tennessee. The next, serving four years and veteranizing, lives, but is almost a physical wreck, his health laid upon the altar of his country. The third and youngest is still pretty well, I thank you; but, Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that so long as I have a memory to remember what Thomas fought for, so long as I know that for nearly a quarter of a century his widow and children have struggled without that gallant prop [turning to Mr. NORWOOD], Scottish though he was in origin, I feel not called upon to get down upon my bended knees in the Capitol of my country (with all due respect to the gentleman from Georgia) and apologize for Thomas's death, for William's ruined health, or for myself. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, for myself I have nothing to say. The part that I played in the great drama that touched us all so closely was a very humble one, and merits not the distinguished mention that came from the gentleman from Georgia. Not at all. I deserve no credit for what I did; but the little I did was done cheerfully and honestly, and now, having been sent by my good people to the American Congress, I feel that having widows close to me in my own family, having others come to me and write to me from every quarter of my State, I might almost say every part of the country, I may, perhaps, be permitted to appeal honestly and kindly, as I have done, in behalf of those widows, without being charged with doing it "to get soldiers' votes," or, to use the elegant language of the father of the Democratic side [Mr. REAGAN], "to buy votes," to carry through an "iniquity," as he termed the widows' pension bill. Who should plead for them here if the comrades of their dead may not?

Mr. Chairman, I end this debate as I began it, without one rancorous feeling in my heart. Earnestness and truth are not vituperation and abuse. Gentlemen [turning to Mr. HAMMOND] may smile, but not all on that side smile. I will not refuse to believe that many of you on the Democratic side can appreciate the motives that actuated me in this debate.

My friends, I have only this to say in conclusion, that coming here to this my adopted land, I feel that I should raise my voice without cowardice or cringing, and without unmanly abuse, contending for what I was taught to respect—the rights of every citizen before the law and for the grandeur and honor of my country, the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

The CHAIRMAN. There are seventeen minutes remaining of the time allotted to that side of the House, of which seven will be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], if he so desires, he having reserved seven minutes of the twenty to which he was entitled. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] can not yield more than ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McCOMAS. Then I yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel called upon to enter upon any defense of General Dudley. He, in my judgment, was faithful to every trust as a soldier, private citizen, and official; nor is it my purpose to arraign the Commissioner of Pensions, General Black.

I, sir, wish to raise my voice in behalf of the soldiers of the civil war, my comrades living, whose only means of support is their daily labor, and who by reason of old age or disease are rendered incapable by means of manual labor to earn a living for themselves and those whom God has given them. It is for them that I would speak. We can not shut our eyes to the fact that there are tens of thousands of such in the land, brave, honest, industrious men, but incapacitated by old age or disease. Thus situated, they are in want. Their demands should rise above mere partisan politics. To know their wants should insure immediate action for their relief.

The first act of this Congress was to vote $5,000 a year to that model wife and mother, the widow of General Grant. To this the nation, North and South, said amen.

At that time, as now, many of the old veterans who rendered the glorious achievements and fame of a Grant possible were and are permitted by this people to go hungry, cold, and almost naked.

In their abject poverty, amid their sorrows and sufferings, there comes to them out of the past a voice of wondrous sweetness, saying, "Fear not; a grateful country will care for him who shall have borne the battle." This nation should not be unmindful of its promise to its defenders. Not one of the least of them should ever be suffered to be the recipient of private charity to sustain life or to become the inmate of an almshouse.

Yet I am told that if these our soldiers, thus circumstanced by age or disease, for whom I plead, can trace their disabilities to injuries received or disease contracted in the line of duty while in the service provision is made for such by existing law. It is for the class of soldiers who can not make this proof, yet were always in line for duty, that legislation should be had.

These men, through the years of the war, endured the privations of the camp, the hardships of the march, the shock of battle uncomplainingly. Year in and year out their bed was the ground, from which they oft arose stiff and cold, with many a pain, yet they sought not the hospital tent, but without complaint or murmur took up the line of march. They were as true to duty as is the dial to the sun. The war ended; they returned to the pursuits of civil life; they had never sunk the citizen into the mere soldier. In this battle for a livelihood many have fallen by the wayside, old age or disease rendering them unequal to the task. Every one of whom who is deserving I would have pensioned.

To this, I venture to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, those who held the plow while these men fought the battles will not be heard to complain. In the past the storehouse of rhetoric has been despoiled of its choicest words that they might be grouped into eloquent sentences in honor of the heroic deeds of these men for use in party platforms, speeches in Congress and upon the stump, while the men suffer for bread.

This nation owes these old soldiers "a royal debt, which with a bounteous hand they kindly lent."

Shall they be repaid with words? Words, be they ever so eloquent, will not warm the cold, clothe the naked, nor feed the hungry. It is bread and not words that is demanded. It will not do to accuse this or that side for its shortcomings in the past while we do nothing in the present.

The most eloquent tribute possible for mortal tongue to pay to the patriotism and heroism of these men without legislation to relieve their suffering is as idle a mockery as was the statue of Liberty in whose shadow the patriots of France were guillotined, as lifeless as the grinning mummy in the catacombs of Egypt.

Let the promises of the nation made in the day of its extremity to these its defenders—then strong, their steps responsive to the music of the Union—be liberally construed and faithfully enforced in this the day of their extremity and of the nation's prosperity toward those brave men who rendered that prosperity possible.

"Fear not; a grateful people will care for him who shall have borne the battle," said the great apostle of liberty to his chosen disciples. This covenant should not be broken. Let the performance of the nation be equal to her promise Let her not be "as one that keeps the word of promise to our ear and breaks it to our hope." Let not this sacred duty to provide for the soldiers of the Union be postponed. Let these destitute veterans read the nation's gratitude in its acts.

All that I ask for these men we propose, and I trust will do, for the veterans of the Mexican war, and this without regard to whether the recipient be rich or poor. The Mexican veteran gave us increased territory; the Union veteran preserved us a nation. To the Union soldiers the Stars and Stripes, the symbol of the Union of the States established by the fathers, was a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night.

Sir, the evidence of their bravery and love of country shines forth from every star and is written by the finger of heroism upon every stripe of that flag as it hangs in graceful folds above your head. None of these veterans, who are now old or sick and depending upon their daily labor for support, should be compelled through our neglect of a plain duty to seek food and shelter in the county poor-house, and through its windows look upon that flag for the protection of which two-score and five years ago they offered their lives. Put not off for to-morrow that which can be done to-day.

Let not this Congress adjourn until it supplements the widows' pension bill by a bill providing a pension for these old or sick and destitute soldiers of the Republic.

A few days since the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] in eloquent words exclaimed, "We are here in the house of our fathers and are here to stay." At this none can rejoice more than I. It gives assurance that the disposition to depart from the paternal roof of Uncle Sam was forever buried by that silent man of destiny at Appomattox, and that henceforth we stand shoulder to shoulder, having but one flag, and that of a united and prosperous country. Yet would it not be proper while here in the house of our fathers, rejoicing over our sons who were lost and are found, to think of those our soldiers, now broken in health and in want of the necessaries of life, who formed their bodies into a living wall between the house of our fathers and the deadly assaults of those who would destroy it, by their loyalty and courage preserving for us and our children a government of the family, by the family, and for the family, in the house of our fathers?

Mr. LE FEVRE obtained the floor and said: I yield to my colleague [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, in that length of time I desire simply to vindicate the truth of history which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] unintentionally perverted. He read testimony which I can not now review of an occurrence in 1856; and said that a witness testified that he did the thing with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, Howell Cobb. That was the language of the gentleman from Michigan. Now, Howell Cobb did not become Secretary of the Treasury until March 7, 1857; and on the 30th of that month he wrote, as Secretary of the Treasury, the letter which I had read the other day. As it is an excellent piece of history, I take this occasion to repeat the last two or three sentences:

> No one regards with more interest than I do the success of the national Democratic party at this important period in our history. But that success must not be purchased at the expense of the public interest, which might be the case if those holding high and important offices should absent themselves from their posts to conduct the canvass.

The gentleman may say that the prior administration did not so behave. I do not know what the history is. I do know that if it misbehaved the succeeding administration repented and changed its policy—a thing that gentlemen on the other side do not understand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, my colleague undertook to state what took place in a committee of which I had the honor to be chairman in the last Congress, and in that statement a question of veracity is raised. I appeal to every gentleman on the floor who was a member of that committee, Republicans and Democrats, as to the truth of what I now state, that the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay as a committee gave the gentlemen who appeared before us, of which my colleague was one, no assurance as to what it would do. Some conversation was had, but no action taken. The idea conveyed by the letters which I hold in my hand, and which the gentleman asked to have printed, is that I, as chairman of the committee, promised what the committee would do before it had taken any action at all—a proposition absurd on its face. Furthermore, I say that in conversation at the time with either General Wagoner or General Merrill—I forget now which—I criticised some things in the propositions of the soldiers' committee, and he admitted to me that as a matter of public policy it was perhaps going a little too far. On the other hand, the committee reported much that was recommended by these gentlemen, including increase of widows' pensions, and one important bill passed the House but slept in the Senate. To prove that some of the statements in the letters are not true I will read one sentence:

> Greatly to our surprise and disappointment the bill was so amended in the House, and on motion of the chairman, as to become a very objectionable measure.

Now, I appeal to the records of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman refused to permit me to have those letters printed; and now he undertakes to put me in the attitude of failing to have the letters read——[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I asked to have the letters read. I propose to have them printed as part of my remarks, if the gentleman does not publish them.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal now to the records of the House to prove that the statement which I have just read is not true, because the bill was not amended at all in the House, nor was there any proposition to amend it by anybody. Therefore I say that the statement bears upon its face the evidence that it contains untruths.

It is proper to remark that the writers of the letters are Republicans, and their purpose in writing these letters is fully enough disclosed in the letters themselves. Their publication in my district at the time they were published was a part of the same programme that sent Commissioner Dudley to Columbus.

But I have something else in hand. I want to read some proof, and I wish I had time to read all I have here. I desire to put it in as proof to support the charge I made that Colonel Dudley, the late Commissioner of Pensions, did leave his place in the Pension Office in this city and go to Ohio to take charge of a political campaign in that State. What for? Were there no Republicans in Ohio capable of managing that campaign? Oh, no! You would not admit that, my friend [referring to Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. [Laughter].

There was an object in it. Let us see what that object was. The Senate had sent back to this House the Mexican pension bill loaded with propositions they knew could not pass, but which could be used they thought to good purpose in the coming campaign. The soldier vote was important. Ohio was then a Democratic State. Its governor and all its State officers were Democrats. It must be carried in October. There was one man who had gained a reputation for peculiar methods in politics in managing a campaign in Indiana. He was the Commissioner of Pensions. The soldiers' vote was important. The Commissioner was just the man to go to Ohio and manage that important campaign. It was necessary to have him there because it was necessary to have the soldiers' vote. [Laughter and applause.]

It is true he resigned, to take effect on the 10th of September, but he came back in October and resumed his duties, as a letter, which will be found on page 70 of the report I hold in my hands, will show, which I will quote from:

I have the honor to report that I returned to my post of duty on Thursday, the 16th October, having been absent therefrom forty-one days in all. I was absent on the 17th day of October, and returned again to duty Saturday, October 18th, and am now on duty as Commissioner.

I quote from Major Clark's testimony:

Q. Did Mr. Dudley leave the office after that?
A. Yes. He was there, I think, a week after that.
Q. Then he assumed to be on duty here at that time?
A. I gathered so from his letter, but that is only an inference.
Q. Had you any knowledge of his performing any of the duties of the office after the date of this letter?
A. I thought he was not performing any duty.
Q. Did he, during that time, sign any letters or official papers?
A. I inquired, after he had gone, whether he had or not, and I was told that he had. I was groping in the dark.

And I will stop to say of Major Clark, on whom some aspersions have been cast in this debate, that a more conscientious, straightforward, faithful officer was not to be found in the Pension Office or any other office. When under oath before the investigating committee he answered in an honest, straightforward manner the questions asked him and no more. It seems that Colonel Dudley before he went to Columbus went to Chicago and then to Indiana, attending all the political conventions, till he finally turned up in Ohio to take charge of the political campaign there. Before he went he ordered certain of his lieutenants to meet him there. They were ordered from place to place. These orders did not go through the Pension Office. More than one hundred of these special examiners altogether were in Ohio just before the October election out of about three hundred and sixty.

Somebody has said there was only one examiner to about 180,000 population, but there were sent into my district alone, I find, eleven, besides some on leave. I said the other day six or eight, but I find instead of six or eight there were eleven of them who were on duty, drawing pay. [Laughter.] Eighteen were sent into my colleague's district to help him. [Laughter.] The official records show there were eighteen there performing duty.

Here is a letter showing exactly how many were down there:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1885.

DEAR SIR: On Friday preceding the second Tuesday of October, 1884, I boarded an Ohio and West Virginia Railroad train at Porter Station, Gallia County, Ohio, bound for Athens, Ohio; changed to Cincinnati, Washington and Baltimore Railroad at McArthur Junction, and by that road reached Athens. The distance by the route I traveled from Porter to Athens is about 52 miles. At the various stations along the two roads, including Porter and Athens, on the day I refer to, there boarded and left the trains fourteen gentlemen known to me and reported to me by reputable gentlemen to be special examiners of the Pension Bureau.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN L. VANCE.

Mr. JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C.

I suppose this was all accidental! [Laughter and applause.]

In order to see how some of these agents acted, let me turn to page 5 of the report of the investigation (Report No. 2683, Forty-eighth Congress). An appointment was made by one of these examiners with a claimant for a pension in my district to meet him and some other parties on the day of the election. He met them at the house of a leading Republican of that precinct. They met there. This Republican was to furnish an affidavit. He said in substance, in the presence of the examiner—and I refer to the testimony because I have not time to read it—that he would make an affidavit for them if they would vote the Republican ticket. [Great laughter and applause.] I will read some of the evidence, as given by George Starkey:

Q. Did Mr. Winthrop himself give you any advice there or elsewhere?
A. We went there between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning, and he kept us until 4 o'clock, when we started to go to the town-house. He was going up to the stable to get his horse. On the way he said, "Boys, Taylor is the man to vote for, if you ever want to get your pensions." That is all he said.
Q. Did he tell you when he thought you would get your pension if you so voted?
A. He told me he thought I would get it in about three weeks; and it is pretty nearly three months ago and I have not heard from it yet.

By Mr. BREWER:

Q. Did you vote the Republican ticket?
A. Yes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you sons who are voters?
A. I have one son who is a voter.
Q. State what ticket you have always voted before.
A. I have always voted the Democratic ticket.
Q. What ticket had your son voted?
A. This was the first time he ever voted, and I think I got him to vote the Republican ticket.
Q. And that was the result of this interview with Winthrop, was it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What ticket did you vote at the November election?
A. The Democratic ticket.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did either of the other gentlemen who had been in Mr. Barton's house talking with you see you vote?
A. Yes; Barton did. I told him all right; I would vote that ticket. He followed us right along, me and George Forshey, and saw us put in our tickets.
Q. Did he see your son vote also?
A. My son, I think, had voted before that.
Q. Barton followed you along to see how you voted, did he?
A. Yes. They had us in a pretty close place, I tell you. I am a poor man, and have lost my health, and was trying for a pension.
Q. And you were led to believe by what took place there, were you, that if you wanted to get a pension you had better vote the Republican ticket?
A. Yes, sir; I was.

By Mr. WHITING:

Q. Did Winthrop tell you you should have your pension if you voted the Republican ticket?
A. He said I would get it in about three weeks; that is what he said.

The testimony is all printed here, and I wish I had time to read it all to you. It is interesting. In answer to the question how many of his family and friends voted the Republican ticket who had previously voted the Democratic ticket, the response was that fifteen in all were persuaded to vote the Republican ticket on the promise of an early pension. [Laughter and applause.]

Another witness, one Forshey, says that to his certain knowledge eight votes were changed from the Democratic to the Republican side. Here is his testimony:

Q. Where were you on the 14th of October?
A. I was at the town house of Lawrence Township.
Q. Was that the day of election?
A. That was the day of election.
Q. And the town house was the place of election?
A. Yes, it was the polling place.
Q. Did you see Mr. Winthrop on that day?
A. I did.
Q. State where you saw him.
A. I saw him at Mr. Barton's.
Q. Who were present?
A. Mr. Starkey, Mr. Barton, Elias Forshey, and George W. Sutton, I think, and David Martin.
Q. How did you happen to go there?
A. I was invited by Mr. Starkey. He left word for me to be there to give testimony in the case of Mr. Starkey, and to have testimony taken in my own case. So that on the 14th we met there precisely at the hour he invited me to be there.
Q. That was on election day?
A. That was on election day.
Q. State what took place.
A. There was a good deal of talk and electioneering going on there between Mr. Barton and several other organs or politicians of the precinct. We asked Mr. Barton to fill out our affidavits. He said he would providing we would vote his ticket.
Q. What was his ticket?
A. The Republican ticket. He did not like to take our words for it and accompanied us to the polls and saw us put our votes in.
Q. What are your politics?
A. I am a Democrat.
Q. Have you always voted the Democratic ticket?
A. I always voted the Democratic ticket.
Q. Which of those gentlemen whom you have named were Republicans?
A. David Martin and Norriston Barton were the organs of the Republican party at that precinct to make themselves useful.
Q. State anything further that you heard said in the house at that time?
A. I believe that that was all that was said in the house. After we got through there and started up to the polls Mr. Winthrop spoke on the way of the good qualities of Mr. Taylor, of his soldiership, and of how he sympathized with the soldiers, and to give poor crippled men pensions. He said that Taylor was undoubtedly the man to support, for he knew how to sympathize with the soldier.

He said also that you (Mr. WARNER) were not the man. I believe, if my memory serves me right, that he spoke of a bill entitled the Mexican pension bill. I think he spoke of that.

Q. State whether you were led to believe from what took place there that, in order to secure the allowance of your claim, it was better for you to vote the Republican ticket.

A. Yes; I thought the thing looked equally in the way it was, and that is what led me to vote the Republican ticket.

Q. Have you sons who are voters?

A. Yes; I have three sons voters. The third of them gave his first vote that day. I have also a son-in-law who is a voter.

Q. Do you know how they voted?

A. I suppose they voted the way the old man went.

Q. You think that they were led to believe that it was for the interest of the old man to vote in that way?

A. I believe so.

Q. How do you know how they voted?

A. They said that they would vote in that way.

Q. How did you vote in the November election?

A. I voted for Cleveland.

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. Did you tell your boys before they voted how you were going to vote?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see them vote?

A. No; I do not know that I did.

Q. How had they voted before?

A. They had always voted the Democratic ticket.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You state that you were made to believe by what took place there that the success of your claim depended, in some degree at least, upon how you voted?

A. Yes. I thought so. That is the way the thing looked to me from the way they were talking.

Q. About how many votes do you think were influenced on that day by such methods?

A. To be honest and upright about it, I think I controlled pretty nearly eight votes on that day.

Q. This was an appointment made prior to election day to have you all there on election day?

A. Yes. I had not seen Mr. Winthrop from the 30th of January, 1884, until the 14th day of October, 1884.

This is the way they did it in my district. [Laughter.]

And remember, Mr. Chairman, this was only on one day and by one of these special examiners, while there were eleven in all, besides some on leave in that district. You can estimate the results from such methods. I do not think I need go any further in sustaining the charge that the Pension Bureau was used for political purposes in that campaign. I ought not neglect to say that the committee found that this special examiner at this very time was making false returns to enable him to charge for liveries he never used and his per diem for time he was not on duty.

I do not charge, sir, that this sort of work was done by Colonel Dudley's order, I do not charge that it was done with his knowledge; but I do charge that it was the logical outcome of his influence while at Columbus managing a political campaign in which every sort of appeal was made to soldiers. I could quote from this testimony evidence to show that politics as the result of this influence permeated the whole Pension Office.

Now, in the little time left I wish to refer to my colleague from the Cincinnati district [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who in his speech the other day painted his city black, as black as language could paint it—

> As when some mighty painter dips
> His pencil in hues of earthquake and eclipse.

He has shown it to be the most corrupt city on the continent. And yet he has been sent here as its Representative for a good many years. [Laughter and applause.] And it seems to have been growing worse and worse all the time. [Renewed laughter.]

But the gentleman on yesterday appealed to records. He says by their records you shall know them. "Records do not die, nor can the logic by which they teach be buried in the grave of dead issues." Now, I hold him to the logic of the record which is in my hand, and that is the investigation to which he himself has referred and of which the honorable Speaker of this House was the chairman and which he says was fair. I am sorry I have not time to read all the testimony of Mr. Egan and some others.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I regret exceedingly that I have not time to refer to some of the testimony which I know my colleague wants to hear and which is undeniable, because it is his own sworn testimony. He has told us in a general way of the corruptions in Cincinnati. I would like to refer to some specific cases. He tells himself how much he paid for the help of that "penitentiary bird," Eph. Holland, to assist him in his election—the man who had two hundred and fifty reasons for voting for him, and every one of them worth a dollar. [Laughter and applause.]

My colleague spoke the other day of "men who were brought from the streets with a penitentiary smell in their clothes." This was one of that kind. I regret that I have not time to read some of this testimony for the benefit of my colleague and the instruction of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I do not apologize for corrupt acts committed by Democrats and condemn corruptions only when committed by Republicans. Whoever commits a fraud on the ballot is an enemy to democracy, an enemy to free government, an enemy to society; and I care not whether it is by the McLean gang or the Tom Campbell gang that frauds are committed, I denounce them everywhere. A Democrat who commits a fraud on the ballot or who seeks to corrupt it is the worst enemy the party has, and the sooner he is got out of it and into the penitentiary the better for the party. But my colleague admits by his testimony, which I hold in my hand, that he paid money to men of the worst character to aid him in his campaign in 1878.

There are three steps that follow one after the other as certainly as night follows day. They are money to corrupt, fraud to overturn, then violence to destroy. [Applause.] The first, from his own testimony, my colleague was willing to take. Can he complain that this

> Bloody instructions, which being taught, return
> To plague the inventor?

By taking the first step did you not pave the way for the second? I call upon my colleague now, instead of whitewashing Republican fraud, to condemn corruption wherever found.

I have never known any occasion when my colleague was not ready, although guilt might be > Written all

> Black as the damning drops that fall
> From the denouncing angel's pen,

if he was but a Republican, with the whitewash brush to paint him white and write "righteous" and "justified" on his forehead. [Applause.] I know my colleague is patriotic; I believe he earnestly desires to see a better state of things in Cincinnati; but it can not be brought about by simply transferring power from one gang to another. All honest men must place the purity of the ballot above partisan zeal. On that popular government must stand or fall.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Of the thirty minutes left to me I yield the gentleman from Ohio ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am very much obliged for that ten minutes.

I repeat that anybody who is willing to commit fraud upon the ballot-box——

Mr. McMILLIN. Or by it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; or by it, is an enemy to Democracy. They are the worst enemies the Democratic party have; and I say to the gentleman from the Cincinnati district if the investigation going on there shows that any man has got his seat in the Legislature of Ohio, in either house, by fraud, let him be put out, and let the guilty parties be sent to the penitentiary, whether Democrats or Republicans. But my colleague, while denouncing Democrats, comes here to justify the ex-Commissioner of Pensions and to apologize for his course in quitting his place while holding on to his office and drawing his salary and going out to a State not his own to conduct a political campaign because of the peculiar methods he knew how to use.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I can not stop for questions now. My friend knows, too, that gang known as the Tom Campbell gang forced a ticket on his party which decent Republicans in his city would not vote for, and yet I have never heard any condemnation of this gang by him. All I ask is that he will not only condemn Democrats who do wrong, but join me in denouncing fraud and corruption in whatever party it is found.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now has the gentleman time to yield for a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have not.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I will take some other time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have a letter or two here that I want to bring before the committee in the time yielded me. Here is one written by Commissioner Dudley. I pass over a great many. And let me say to my friends on the other side of the House, you are not half as anxious for an investigation of the Pension Office as you think you are. But let the books be opened. [Opening a large letter-book.] Here is a letter to John Sherman:

> I have received your letter of the 18th instant, in which you ask that I give Mr. Henry C. Hedges—

Hedges was candidate on the Republican side, I believe.

Mr. GEDDES. In my district, but he could not fool the soldiers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. He says—

> That I give Mr. Henry C. Hedges the same privilege in calling up cases as is accorded to his competitor, the Hon. Mr. GEDDES. I have, therefore, directed that Mr. Hedges's calls be in every case promptly attended to, as I do not wish to make any discrimination whatever between the party nominees.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is that what you find fault with?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What I find fault with is this: You do not find a Democratic candidate who ever had that courtesy extended to him; not one. No such courtesy would have been extended a Democrat, although he might have been as good a soldier as there was in the war. And what is more, take your Pension Office from top to bottom, from garret to cellar, and although your party and the ex-Commissioner of Pensions claim to be the special, the guardian friends of the soldier, you could not find in it one Democratic soldier, however gallantly he had fought in the war, though he might have lost a limb in battle, unless he voted the Republican ticket. He was told "No, sir; no use for you here." That has been the policy of the Republican party ever since the war. That is its friendship for the soldier as a soldier. The soldier may have fought gallantly, but that went for little if he did not vote the Republican ticket.

We ask now a chance, an even chance, for the wounded and disabled Democratic soldier; we demand now fair play not only in the granting of pensions, but in the equal right to hold office under this Government, which they, too, sacrified so much to save. That is what you have never allowed.

I have been in Ohio—

Mr. Dudley says in a letter to George S. Merrill—for the past three weeks assisting in the management of the campaign there, and I am going back, to stay until the elections are over, very shortly. I think we will be able to carry the State at the end of a very hard struggle. Indiana will go Republican if Ohio does.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY.

He had been there and is going back again.

I will now read a letter addressed to D. O. Bell, Detroit, Mich.:

Your personal telegram came to the office during my sickness and I take this early opportunity to reply by letter, the first I have written since my convalescence. The difficulty which presents itself at the outset in the Sligh-Boise controversy is that Senators PALMER and CONGER do not seem to have agreed on any settled plan of action. Senator PALMER is of opinion that the appointment of Dr. Sligh and the removal of Dr. Boise will result in a defeat of the Republican candidate for Congress in that district.

It would not do to have that done. The Commissioner of Pensions considers it his duty to look to that.

Senator PALMER seems to think otherwise. Now, I know nothing about the two men except what I get through these two Senators, and it is but fair, I think, that I should insist on their coming to an agreement as to what is to be done, as I do not want to do anything to injure the prospects of the party in any way.

Most assuredly he did not.

Mr. HENLEY. Let us have all that published in the RECORD.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not suppose the gentlemen on the other side would object to publishing it all. Mr. Chairman, if I have any time left I want now to read some of the testimony of my friend from Cincinnati [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. I know he will like to hear it.

A MEMBER (on the Republican side). Give us the testimony.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is what you prefer I know, and I will give it to you.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Give us anything that is not original. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it was original it would not be agreeable to the gentleman from Maine. I read now from the report of a committee in regard to an election in the city of Cincinnati, in which my friend [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] was interested, and I read from his testimony. He was on the witness-stand, and he was asked the question:

Are you acquainted with that national character, Ephraim Holland? He answered, I am. * * * One day, after that, I was passing the Gibson House, and Colonel Weitzel was there, and he said to me, "Holland and Duffy are in the room here; come in and see them." I went in. They were in the little room back of the bar-room, and I went in and was introduced to them.

They went "back of the bar-room."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes; we went back. You always stop in the bar-room. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; I would not go behind the screen, but this was work that required to be screened. The witness proceeds:

After the ordinary salutations I said to them, "Mr. Weitzel informs me that you gentlemen are not supporting the Democracy this fall." Holland assented. I do not remember his words, but he assented. Then Weitzel said, "They are inclined to give you a lift" or "to give the Republican ticket a lift;" I don't remember which he said. Weitzel then said to me, "They will expect to be paid something for their work. Holland said, "Yes; certainly." Said I, "What do you ask?" I think he named three or four or five hundred dollars. I said "No; I won't do that." Finally I said, "I will give you $150 if you will engage faithfully to perform the work and to secure an honest election in the fourth ward."

* * * * * * *

[Laughter.]

I believe I conferred with some of my Republican brethren about the arrangement and they sanctioned it. I walked around and met Holland at the hotel and I paid him three $50 bills again.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you say that $150 is all that you paid either to the Holland or Duffy party?

A. You have not asked me that. I remember now that that evening, after I had agreed to pay Holland $150, he insisted that there should be paid also for expenses $50 or $60, I don't remember which, and either Colonel Weitzel or I gave him $50 or $60; that was handed to Holland. I did not speak to Duffy except when I was in the room and we were talking together.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That was the first time that Democratic influence was ever used for a holy purpose. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, in order that the balance of the testimony of that interesting witness may go into the RECORD, I yield five minutes more to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will read some more.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Read it all. You will find it good all the way through. It is rich.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, it is rich and rare; there is no question about that. I come now to Mr. Egan.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, no. Go back to Holland. That will show why your party were unable to stuff ballot-boxes in the fourth ward at that election, as they had been in the habit of doing.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, Satan never started out on a mission without first putting on the guise of a saint. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would as lief take your testimony on such a point as that of any man I know. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Here comes Mr. Egan on the stand. He had an interview with my colleague. He was asked what took place at that interview, and he said, referring to my colleague:

He told me that he was expecting some money, but he hadn't got it—had been expecting it two or three days.

Q. Did he say where he was expecting it from?

A. I think he said from Washington. I left him then. I believe we made arrangements to meet again at his office.

Q. When?

A. I think the Sunday previous to the election.

A MEMBER. Sunday!

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, on Sunday. This was holy work. They must have a pure election.

Q. Did you meet him there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What took place there?

A. I took some men named Thomas Donnelly, John Carroll, Edward Wilson, Samuel Drew, and John O'Connor.

Q. They went with you to his office on Sunday?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was your business there on Sunday?

A. Mr. BUTTERWORTH told me he wanted to get some men to work for him on election day, and I took the men there and introduced them to him. Mr. BUTTERWORTH told us some jokes, and finally made a proposition to them himself, what they were to do.

[Laughter.]

* * * * * * * *

Q. Did Mr. BUTTERWORTH say anything to these men when he gave them the money?

A. I think he did.

Q. State whether or not he did; and, if so, what he said.

A. Yes, sir. He said that he wanted them not to forget to vote for him and Mr. Cullen especially. He said it didn't matter a damn whom they voted for so they voted for him and Cullen.

[Laughter.]

We tried to get into Mr. BUTTERWORTH's office, which is in the Johnson building, I think on the fifth floor. I suppose it is not more than 100 feet from the Gibson House. We wanted to get into the office to get tickets. Democratic tickets had been written with Mr. BUTTERWORTH's name on them which we supposed to be there; but I received some of them afterward, the next morning. We found the office locked, and we could not get in, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH made some remarks that "it was mighty damn funny that a man couldn't get into his own office."

[Laughter.]

* * * * * * * *

We came around on Fifth street, and my brother and him was talking about something connected with money matters. I know, for my brother was making the remark that he could not do nothing with that amount of money, or something like that; anyhow, I interfered in the matter and we walked back to the carriage, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH and my brother parted. After talking with Mr. BUTTERWORTH first, he handed me $10 in silver half-dollars; then he gave me $10 afterward.

* * * * * * * *

Q. How were those men paid? Was the money counted out or given them in envelopes at Collard street?

A. No, it was counted out, $2 apiece.

Q. Where was the money taken from?

A. Mr. BUTTERWORTH reached under the seat of the carriage and pulled out a satchel from underneath and took the money out of it.

[Renewed laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. A Greenbacker always gives away something he has not got. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The witness proceeds:

Q. Silver or paper?

A. There was silver and paper, because he took a package and broke it open——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I thought I had some additional time yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who yielded it had none to yield.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am very sorry, for there is a great deal more of this testimony that is very interesting.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You and I will get together and go over it some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The fifteen minutes remaining I have promised to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], and in justice to him I can not yield any more time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will not now object to my colleague having printed with his remarks this letter on which I have commented. I would be glad to have it printed in connection with my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] is recognized, and yields his time to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood my colleague on the right [Mr. GROSVENOR]—and I do not wish to do an injustice to any one—to say in substance in the course of his remarks "I do not read the letters but will print them as part of my remarks." Now, it appears to me that objection should have been made then, because if it had then been made he would no doubt have read the letters in connection; but there being no dissent, he took it for granted that the letters would be published as a part of his remarks. I submit to the House that in fairness to him and to my friend on the other side [Mr. WARNER] they ought to be so published.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that objection was made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not object to the printing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the request. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Ohio on the right [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. GROSVENOR] have leave to publish with their remarks certain letters to which reference has been made. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is allowed.

Mr. GOFF. In the light of this discussion surely it will not be inappropriate if we seriously consider the serious facts alluded to by my friend from Iowa. He has spoken naught but truth and soberness. I may be charged with raising the banner of sectionalism; but certainly, in the estimation of all fair-minded men, the charge can not be maintained. Those who desire to evade the force of shameful facts may say I appeal to the recollections of the war, that I stir up the ashes of the civil strife; but those who believe in justice and worship at the shrine of truth, wherever they may be found, will know that I speak of terribly real issues; that I allude to the crying evil of the day—the greatest blot upon the civilization of the age.

The exercise of the ballot is the grandest prerogative of our citizenship. Every American citizen, wherever he lives, wherever born—it makes no difference who rocked his cradle or where God's sunshine first kissed his cheek—is entitled unrestrainedly of his free will to cast one ballot for the principle he adheres to, the man of his choice, and to have that ballot honestly counted as it was cast. To our shame be it said such is not the case with us to-day. We do not object that the South is solid; we do object to the means by which it is made solid. As long as it is so solid, then the North, the East, and the West should be solid by honest means against it.

The effect of such solidity is to give one section of our country much greater power in the Congress of the nation than it is legally or constitutionally entitled to; it destroys our theory of representation; it undermines the confidence of the people in their form of government; it produces results not intended by the voters, and it gives ascendency to principles condemned by intelligent public sentiment. Mr. Chairman, we should not compromise with this great wrong; we have already been too indifferent to it. Justice demands that we should meet it with the courage of other days. If citizens are to be massacred in Mississippi because they support the Republican ticket, if we tolerate it, the day will come when the like will be done in Massachusetts also. If voters are to be intimidated and disfranchised in South Carolina and Georgia because the color of their skin is black, and the nation submits to it, the day will come when it will be so meted out to us in Ohio and West Virginia.

There is one act of President Cleveland's administration above all others that I honor him for, and it has direct bearing on this question. It was, it is, the revocation of the commission of the postmaster at Hazelhurst, Miss., and the remark, "We will draw the line, in making appointments, on murder." Now, do not say I raise a false issue; your chosen Executive—chosen by such shameful means—has given it the sanction of his high authority.

Mr. Chairman, do not misunderstand me. I do not object to the confederate soldier voting just as he pleases, nor to his holding office. It is his right. My country's law concedes him the right, and I believe in it, and for one will defend that right for him. I only ask that he shall be elected by fair ballots, cast by honest voters, and counted as they were cast, and I do protest against that system that sends certificates to this House, based on the subversion of the rights of our fellow-citizens, or written with a pen dipped in the blood of our fellowmen, whose only crime is that God made their skin black or that they dared advocate the glorious cause of liberty and justice, that all men are free and equal, as taught by the grand party at whose shrine I have worshipped from boyhood.

In the contest of 1884 the Republican party would have succeeded had there been as fair a vote throughout the South as there was in the North. The difference of 1,142 votes in the State of New York did not, in truth and in fact, determine the judgment of 55,000,000 people. The honest judgment of our free citizenship was not recorded in that election. The Republican party offered to the people in that contest as a candidate for the Presidency one of the most magnificent men of the century, James G. Blaine, representing all that was grand in American statesmanship, and for the Vice-Presidency John A. Logan, glorious soldier of the West, standing for all that is heroic in the struggle for the Union. Since that party gave the nation Lincoln, Grant, freedom, and the Union it has given us no grander ticket. In the very nature of things it could not be fairly beaten, and it was most unfairly defeated by means of the outrages with which the country is familiar, this political crime for the benefit of the few over the many.

Mr. Chairman, the men so chosen stand not only for the South, but for the East and the West as well as the North; they legislate for all the people of the United States. They regulate taxation; they change the tariff; they decide as to our currency; they determine coinage; they fix pensions; they make appropriations; they decide whether American labor shall be protected by American law, whether free labor shall have good wages or no wages at all.

Mr. Chairman, let us examine the returns from some of the States of the last national election. By the census of 1880 we find the voting population of the five Southern States named to be as follows, as compiled and commented upon by a leading journal of the country:

By the census of 1880 we find the voting population of the five Southern States named to be as follows:

States.	Representatives.	Of voting age.
		Males.	White.	Colored.
Alabama	8	259,844	141,461	118,423
Georgia	10	321,480	177,967	143,471
Louisiana	6	216,787	108,810	107,977
Mississippi	7	238,532	108,254	130,278
South Carolina	7	205,789	86,900	118,889
Total	38	1,242,472	623,392	619,038

The vote in these States was as follows in the last election:

States.	Cleveland.	Blaine.	Others.	Total.
Alabama	92,978	59,444	1,312	153,734
Georgia	94,567	47,964	309	142,840
Louisiana	63,407	46,417	446	110,270
Mississippi	76,510	43,509	4,691	124,720
South Carolina	69,800	21,733	.....	91,623
Total	397,342	219,067	6,758	623,187

Now compare this vote with that of five Northern States nearest in voting population and representation to these five Southern States:

States.	Representatives.	Males of voting age.
Kansas	7	265,714
Wisconsin	9	340,482
Minnesota	5	213,485
New Jersey	7	300,635
Connecticut	4	177,291
Total	32	1,297,607

Here at the first glance it is seen that there is 55,000 more voting population and six less Representatives, and this recalls the fact that it was a Democratic House of Representatives that made the apportionment.

Now look at the votes:

States.	Cleveland.	Blaine.	Others.	Total.
Kansas	90,132	154,406	20,841	275,379
Wisconsin	146,477	165,157	12,354	323,888
Minnesota	70,144	111,923	21,990	204,057
New Jersey	127,784	123,432	9,649	260,825
Connecticut	67,182	65,898	4,079	137,159
Total	501,719	620,816	68,813	1,201,308

Let us carry this comparison further. These five Southern States send thirty-eight Representatives to Congress on a total vote of 623,187, an average of 16,426 votes to the member. The five Northern States send thirty-two Representatives on a total vote of 1,201,308, an average of 37,541 to the Representative. It, therefore, takes two and one-third times as many votes to make a Congressman in the North as in the South.

Connecticut and Nebraska together send seven Representatives to the House by a vote of 271,248, while South Carolina sends seven by a vote of 91,623—but little over one-third. Wisconsin sends nine Representatives on a vote of 323,888, and Georgia ten on a vote of 142,840. Mississippi sends seven Representatives on a vote of 134,720, and New Jersey the same number on a vote of 260,825. Alabama sends eight on a vote of 153,734, and Kansas seven on a vote of 275,379.

These are a few plain fact and figures which are submitted for the consideration of those who still believe that a freeman's ballot should have as much value and be entitled to as much protection in one State as in another.

Gentlemen of the committee, if I do err in thus speaking of official returns, condemn me for it. If I commit a crime in thus alluding to what I sincerely believe to be the most heinous crime of the century, I bow to the judgment the country will inflict upon me. If this be the bloody shirt, then as long as there is such blood as this on the garment will I wave it, and as long as my arm has strength will I hold it up to the gaze of the country. The very contemplation of this outrage should cause the blush of shame to mantle the cheek of every true American citizen, I care not where he lives, under what banner he fought, or what party he has affiliated with.

As long as these things are, it is folly to talk of the Republican party having accomplished its destiny. The mission of the Republican party will never be accomplished until the right of every American citizen, native-born and naturalized, white and black, to vote once and to have that vote counted as cast is acknowledged everywhere where the flag of the country floats and the power of the nation is felt.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] when on the floor the other day made the following remark in reference to what had been said about Colonel Dudley's conduct as Commissioner of Pensions:

Democrats, do not come in the presence of this House and retail slanders that are unsupported by a single statement of facts. Before you make such charges, be frank enough to tell who the witnesses are and by whom you propose to establish the facts.

I have spent some time examining the record to see whether I could find any witnesses for the accommodation of the gentleman. It struck me that the best witness I could find would be Colonel Dudley himself and his officers and staff nearest him, if I could see the records, and upon opening the books I found among others a letter written by him in 1881 to Mr. Keogh, of Greensborough, N. C. The Commissioner had dispensed with the services of a certain Republican in his office and Mr. Keogh asked for his return to the office. The Commissioner writes that his reinstatement has been recommended, "although his record is defective," adding "I shall be glad to be of any service to you at any time in making a fight in the old North State." (Letter-book No. 1, page 229.)

Again, I find a letter which Mr. Dudley wrote September 7, 1881, to General WILLIAM MAHONE. General MAHONE had asked him to have a man named Clements, a special pension examiner, transferred for special duty to Easton, Va., during the canvass. The Commissioner writes in answer:

Yours of the 5th received; party called in, and will be sent as requested.

(Letter-book No. 1, page 468.)

Here is another: On September 16, 1881, Hon. J. D. White, of London, Ky., writes, alleging that one Ferguson and one Richards had been discharged in accordance with the orders of the Secretary; among other things, to discharge all blatant Democrats regardless of their standing and records. (Letter-book No. 2, page 65.)

Again, November 23, 1881, Colonel Dudley writes a letter to one J. H. Hines, of Lynchburg, Va., and congratulates Hines upon the services which Stokes, a clerk in the Pension Office, had rendered in the last campaign. (Letter-book No. 3, page 69.)

Again, we find that on the 31st of December, 1881, he wrote a letter to C. D. Sherwin, Goshen, Ind., stating among other things that he would be at home some days before the election, and that as chairman of the Indiana Republican Association some lively work might be expected from him in aid of the party's success. (Letter-book No. 3, page 324.)

We find also a letter written September 11, 1882, to Thomas B. Cooper, chairman of the Republican State committee, 1205 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa., acknowledging the receipt of a letter asking leave of absence for one Thomas F. Monahan, a clerk in the office, for duty during the campaign, and leave of absence was granted to T. F. Monahan for eleven days from the 30th of October, 1882; for twenty-two days from October 18 to November 8, 1884.

We find also a letter written by Mr. Dudley May 26, 1883, to Hon. W. Stone, Pittsburgh, Pa., touching a certain pension case called the Morly case, and stating that if in the judgment of Stone a mistake had been made he would call a halt in the proceedings; and he added that it would be a severe duty that would compel him (Dudley) to do anything that in his (Stone's) judgment would militate against the best interests of the party. (Letter-book, No. 12, page 347.)

The Commissioner was passing upon the case in his judicial capacity, yet he was perfectly willing, as he states, to prostitute his office for the welfare of his party.

In order to show how fairly men were treated, I wish to refer to a letter of Mr. Dudley, written July 17, 1884, to W. S. Kerr, chairman of the executive committee, Mansfield, Ohio. The chairman had criticised General Dudley for allowing Judge GEDDES to take the credit as a Democratic member of Congress for securing a soldier his bounty. The following is the reply of Mr. Dudley:

JULY 17, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I am just in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, and have to say in reply that the whole subject of Mr. GEDDES's influence with this office has been gone over again and again in correspondence with Mr. W. F. Madden, of Belleville, Mr. J. G. Donaldson, late secretary of the Ohio State Republican executive committee, and with Hon. JOHN SHERMAN. If you will take the trouble to look at a communication sent to Mr. Donaldson July 28, 1883, you will find the whole matter discussed in detail, together with copies of the other letters referred to. In a word, Mr. GEDDES has never exercised any influence with this office not possessed by any other citizen, always excepting a certain amount of courtesy shown to every member of Congress. What use Mr. GEDDES may have made of his Congressional privilege I know not, nor could I control it if I did. I will venture to say, however, that no letter containing the clause, "We take pleasure in notifying you that your pension has been allowed through the special influence of Hon. GEORGE W. GEDDES," was ever sent out from this office. If you can produce such a one I will thank you to forward it to me personally.

Forward the letter you refer to and I will prove it a flat forgery.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

W. S. KERR,
Chairman Executive Committee, Mansfield, Ohio.

That is the way Judge GEDDES was treated.

Mr. GEDDES. Of course they found no such letter. They simply represented to him that they had such a letter, and he requested it; but it never was produced.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. That is the way Judge GEDDES, a Democratic member, was treated. Now let us see how a Republican under the same circumstances was treated by him:

JULY 30, 1884.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

He goes on to say that—

I feel the deepest interest in your success, not only on your own account but on those of the State and the Legislature as well, and I hope that everything will be done to help you in your struggle. As nearly as I can figure it, there are three members of the Legislature and one senator in doubt in your district, and I hope that your campaign and theirs will be blended so as to be of mutual advantage, as they should be. I will do everything I can to give prompt attention to any calls you may make.

Calls for status of pension cases—

I will have letters written in the slips sent by you. Will the Prohibition ticket hurt Calkins in your district?

Very truly, yours,

W. W. DUDLEY.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE, Marion, Ind.

Mr. Chairman, a very considerable parade has been made in regard to a circular letter which Mr. Dudley sent out on the 6th of March, 1884, in which he said:

The functions of special examiners are those of judicial officers seeking for the true facts in cases intrusted to them, and they will not only commend themselves to the community in which they respectively work, but insure the best results to their work and themselves, by perfect reticence upon all topics of a political character. It is hoped that each examiner will heed this timely warning, and to such effect that no just criticism can be laid against him on this ground.

This sounds well. Now if honestly intended to be observed he would cause this to be placed in the hands of the officers to whom directed. Let us see if they were so placed.

I hold in my hand the affidavit of one Mr. Peyton, a Republican, and good authority. It is as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, ss:

John B. Peyton, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he was on the 4th day of March a clerk in the Pension Office at Washington, D. C.; that he was finance clerk, and that it was his special duty to take care of the mail, especially such mail as was to go out. That a bundle of the circulars hereto annexed were placed upon his desk with directions to send one to each special examiner. That within a very few minutes from the time that the circulars in question were placed upon his desk for the purpose aforesaid John M. Welty, then acting chief of the special examination division, removed from his desk every single circular, saying that deponent need not mail them, that he (Welty) would take charge of them.

And deponent further swears that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief the said circulars were not mailed, but were removed from his desk for the purpose of preventing their general circulation among the special examiners.

And deponent further says that between the time that the said circulars were laid upon his desk until the circular hereto annexed was shown him, he has neither seen one himself nor has he seen any one else with such circular, with the possible exception that one of these circulars may have been in evidence before the Warner committee, although deponent has no recollection of any such circular.

JOHN B. PEYTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me on this the 4th day of March, A. D. 1886.
[SEAL.] JAS. N. TAIT, Notary Public.

[Laughter and applause.]

Next we come to the affidavit of John R. Coffin, to which I ask special attention:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, ss.

John R. Coffin, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that between the 26th day of June, A. D. 1880, and the 20th day of November, A. D. 1885, he was employed as a clerk in the Pension Office; and that between the 30th day of June, A. D. 1881, and the 26th day of October, 1884, he was a special examiner, and during that time discharged the duties of said examiner, either in the field or in the special examination division in the Pension Office at Washington, D. C.; and that while engaged in the office at Washington he was chief of that section known as the criminal prosecution and attorney's desk.

And deponent says that during the canvass of 1884 W. W. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions, while no order was issued in terms, it is a matter of record, directed that special examiners be sent into those districts where the political warfare was waging, yet it was well understood that special examiners were assigned to those districts and cases given to them for special examination, not that it was the intent or purpose that they should discharge the duties of special examiners, but that, this assignment being a matter of record, they might draw their per diem and traveling expenses for the purpose of performing political work, and deponent instances as then in his own knowledge the fol owing facts:

In the campaign of 1884 deponent was instructed to hand to one Joseph E. Jacobs, then a special examiner, three or four cases for special examination in Ohio, and that deponent understood at the time, and he believes the said Jacobs understood the same, that his mission was a political mission, and that he was not expected or required to report on these cases, and as a matter of fact deponent knows that when the said Jacobs returned no work had been done on them whatever, and that the said Jacobs nevertheless drew his pier diem and traveling expenses at the time during his absence.

And deponent further says that during the canvass of 1884, more special examiners were sent into Ohio during the time that the canvass was pending than he had ever known in his experience in the office to be sent into any one section at the same time; and that deponent further says, that in the special examination division, and in every other division in the office, every clerk believed that he was expected to render what political services he could, and that the circular hereto annexed was certainly understood by deponent, and he believed by every other examiner, not to mean what it said, but was issued for the benefit of the public, and at the time that this circular was issued the Commissioner of Pensions and the then chief of the special examination division were known to be doing nothing else except political work.

JOHN R. COFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of March, A. D. 1886.

CHARLES S. BUNDY,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Next we come to the affidavit of John M. Welty. He said that he had been a clerk in the Pension Office since 1880; that he knows these circulars were not sent:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, ss:

John M. Welty, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that the circular hereto annexed, and dated upon the face thereof March 6, 1884, was never mailed by him in person, either to any special examiner in person or to any supervising examiner; and further deponent saith not.

JOHN M. WELTY.

J. B. WATERMAN, Notary Public.

Now, let us see a little further along. A man by the name of Gideon A. Lyon, on being sworn, made affidavit as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, ss:

Gideon A. Lyon, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that the annexed circular has been exhibited to him, and that at the date appearing upon its face as the date of the issuance deponent was assistant chief of the special examiners' division of the Pension Office, and that to the best of his recollection, information, and belief he has never seen the circular hereto annexed until the same is this day exhibited to him; and further deponent saith not.

GIDEON A. LYON.

J. B. WATERMAN, Notary Public.

Let us see whether Mr. Dudley did take any part or not in the campaign. Let us see whether or not the proposition made here by the gentleman is going to be carried out. One P. S. Noble was a special examiner and was in the employ of the Pension Department. He was dismissed from his place by General Black. He afterward wrote a letter to General Black asking to be reinstated in his old place. He also wrote a letter to Colonel Dudley asking him to write and tell General Black the truth about his connection with the Ohio campaign. He (Noble) writes Dudley he was "dismissed for being in Mr. Dudley's counsels, when the truth is that I was your stenographic clerk. * * * I can't help asking you to go to Mr. Black and tell him the exact truth, to wit, that I was not in your counsels, knew not of the secret workings of the campaign, did not even know the cipher, and did not take the pains to know it, but that I tried faithfully and honestly to discharge the duties imposed upon me, which I did."

The accuracy of this statement is indorsed upon the back of the letter in question by W. W. Dudley, so that there can be no question of the fact that drawing pay as a special examiner, not as a matter of election but as a matter of compulsion, he was taken out to Ohio, on the telegram of W.W. Dudley, as his private stenographer, when in the pay of the Government, for the purpose of carrying on the Republican campaign.

He was in Ohio during most of September and October, and was paid his per diem and expenses during part of the time he was in Ohio on that occasion.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Was not Noble on leave of absence all that time?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I am glad you asked that question. Mr. Noble during the whole time drew pay and expenses. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I yesterday saw proof he was on duty fifteen days in September and six days in November, for which he only drew pay as well as $1.10 for expenses.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. In November he was paid for nineteen days and in September for twenty-five.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I saw the official roll yesterday.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I took it from the official roll last night. [Great laughter and applause.] I was just that much ahead of the gentleman. [Renewed laughter.]

I call attention to the following, which I have also taken from the record:

Sixty-six special examiners on duty in Ohio during the months of September, October, and November, 1884.

Nineteen additional on leave in the State during a portion of the months of October and November, 1884.

P. S. Noble: Paid per diem for twenty-five days in September; in October was paid for nineteen days. Reports himself from September 11 to 24 inclusive as assisting the supervising examiner at Columbus; September 25 and 26, not officially employed; September 27, in office of supervising examiner; September 29 and 30, on leave; October 1 to 12 inclusive, on leave; 13 to 18 inclusive, assisting supervising examiner at Columbus.

Salary paid for whole time.

I now wish to see if we can furnish any more proof on this charge. Special examiners handled the politics of Ohio during that year; and the people will understand, when they once understand the fact that Ohio has been made the central, pivotal turning-point for campaigns within the last twenty years, why the whole power of the General Government was turned into that State to help to continue in power the Republican party, with none but poor Democrats to stand up against it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In this view the following papers from the records are very important. Let us see whether the Pension Office was run in the interest of pension business only:

A. D. WIGGINS, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am forty-five years old, and my post-office address is Hillsborough, Highland County, Ohio, and I am a claim agent by occupation, and I have been so occupied since 1878. In the summer of 1882 Alphonso Hart was running for Congress as the Republican nominee, and Hart and I talked the matter over; and I explained to Hart that if we could get Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions, to favor Democratic claimants and make their cases special and push their claims through we could make good promises and get their votes, and it was necessary for us to have a good many allowed before the election to show said claimants what we could do. We talked the matter over in this way, that Dudley had carried Indiana for Garfield by what we considered questionable means and had helped Foster for Governor in 1881 by making cases of Democratic claimants special. That was the basis upon which we concluded we would work: Get cases taken up out of their order, made special, and have them allowed right away; and I prepared a list of Democratic claimants and Republican claimants (when they had Democratic relatives they could influence). This list I prepared from my books. And a copy of this list I gave to Alphonso Hart. We afterward revised the list so that only about sixty-three names were on the list that Hart kept for the alleged purpose of having the Commissioner make them special, and I know the cases all were called up and acted upon, the principal part of them being allowed. There was a big boom in my pension business.

I wrote to the Commissioner of Pensions, stating this whole proposition to him, and he wrote me back the following letter:

"I saw by the papers that W. W. Dudley would be at Richmond, Ind., about the 1st of October, 1882, and I thought I would go over there and meet him, and I did so, and I met him in the depot and spoke to him and said, 'Colonel, I received your virtuous letter, which was received with a Christian spirit. Colonel, we are in a very close district, and I want my friend to pull through.' He replied, smiling, 'Those cases shall receive prompt attention;' and in parting he said, 'I will do all I can for your friend Hart.' And he carried out to a large extent just what he said in his letter he could not do. Hart and I figured out what relatives these claimants could control, and his vote will show how much he ran ahead of the State ticket and the influence of this maneuver to a large extent influenced the voters in this county in 1882 and 1884. And in 1884 we worked upon the same claimants who had got their claims and those still expecting them. (I thought these claims were all meritorious.) Hart told me we have special examiners to put those claims forward, and before that time, in 1882, we had no special examiner here. E. S. Davis was sent here in 1882 in one case, but in 1884 we had three at work."

Hamer Soule was here in the country on leave in 1884, and I heard of his making speeches for the Republicans, and Hart expected considerable results from Soule's work. Patton and Boardman were here, home to vote. I do not know whether they worked any in politics or not; and during the campaign the claimants would get letters through me telling them of the condition of their cases, and that they had been called up by Mr. Hart, and in a good many cases had been made special at the personal request of Hon. Alphonso Hart, and these letters I have sent to the claimants. I made strong promises, believing that I was justified in doing so, because Hart claimed to have a powerful influence with the Pension Bureau, and often spoke of what Dudley and Walker would do to help him, and the results showed that he did have a great deal of influence with some of the ruling spirits there.

Q. Did La Force tell you how he got his appointment in the Pension Bureau?

A. He told me that in the Garfield campaign of 1880 he did a great deal of effective work for the Republican ticket at Bedford, Ind., and that gave him his place in the Pension Bureau.

Q. Did he tell you he bought votes?

A. I am not clear as to what he said about that, but I got the impression that he did from what he said.

Q. Have you any other letter written by W. W. Dudley in your possession regarding political matters?

A. No.

A. D. WIGGINS, Deponent.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 5th day of February, 1886, and I certify that the contents were fully made known to deponent before signing.

CHARLES T. FORBES,
Special Examiner.

DEPOSITION B.

On this 3d day of February, 1886, at Buford, county of Highland, State of Ohio, before me, Charles T. Forbes, a special examiner of the Pension Office, personally appeared T. P. Vance, who, being by me first duly sworn, deposes and says: I am 49 years old, and my post-office address is Buford, Highland County, Ohio, and I am a lawyer by occupation. I was a supporter of Alphonso Hart in his second race for Congress, and during the campaign I had a conversation with Hamer Soule, who was then connected with the Pension Office as a special examiner, and with whom I was well acquainted, and I had known him a long while, as his folks lived in this or an adjoining county. The conversation above referred to was concerning Hart's race for Congress, both of us being very anxious for him to be elected. Soule said he was quite sure he could secure a great many votes for Mr. Hart by reason of the position he held; that he had the "grip," as he called it, on a great many of them, and that I would see the result of his work at the end of the race; that he was going to deliver the goods.

I had another conversation with some pension official in the bar-room of the Parlor House, and I do not remember what he said about politics, but I know I thought he was a fool and was giving himself away in what he said. The talk I had with Soule was in front of the Parlor House on the platform, in the town of Hillsborough, Ohio; some two or three persons told me they were going to vote for Hart because he had promised to have their pension cases taken up and allowed right away, or pressed along to an early settlement. These men were Democrats. I remember this, because they were the men we wanted to change to Hart.

T. P. VANCE.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, ss:

G. N. Smith, being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that between April 21, 1870, and the day of the date of the making of this his affidavit he has been a Government clerk, and employed in the Pension Office, and that from or about the month of June, 1880, up to this present time he has been employed from the date of its formation in the Western division, and that for a portion of that time and between the dates of June, 1884, and November of the same year he was an assistant chief of the said division; that one John M. Comstock was at that time chief of the said division, and that some time in the early part of the month of September, A. D. 1884, he received a verbal order from the said Comstock, which deponent believes was an order given to the said Comstock by the then Commissioner of Pensions, that no more cases were to be rejected in that division; but that nothing whatever was said in reference to the admission of cases; and that the said order continued in force until after the election in said year.

GEORGE N. SMITH.

I wonder if there is any proof now in the case to establish the charge made by General Black in his report.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill is now closed, and the Clerk will report the bill by sections for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to come in at the end of line 39. I will state that complaint has been made by pension examining surgeons that their pay has not been made as it should have been made—that is, as they earned it. A difficulty arises from the fact that under the construction of the Treasury Department the money appropriated for this purpose may be used to pay arrears which have accumulated in former years from this source and in order to correct that and that no difficulty may arise in future I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The object, as will be seen, of the amendment is to provide that the appropriations for the ensuing year for the pay of examining surgeons shall be used for the payment of fees and salaries during that year. This is the better course, in my opinion, and then whatever fees may remain due can be supplied in the general deficiency bill, and not be paid in the manner that has heretofore prevailed in the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 39 insert:

"And all money appropriated by this act, other than for the payment of pensions, shall be disbursed subject to the provisions of sections 3678, 3679, and 3690 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. While it is a very desirable amendment, it should come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It has no place under the new rule on this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is not good, for this reason: The sections of the Revised Statutes to which reference is made require that the money appropriated for the current expenses for any purpose shall be applied to that purpose solely. That is the statute as it exists now; and so it is plain that this does not change any existing law or make any new legislation, but it simply directs the Treasury Department to comply with the existing law and pay out the money for the current expenses of the examining surgeons under the terms of the statute.

Mr. RANDALL. If it does not change existing law, then there is no occasion for it here.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is, as I will show the gentleman.

Mr. RYAN. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and I want to add that the construction of the Department is that the law referred to by my friend does not apply in this case at all; and hence the object of his amendment is to legislate upon this bill that law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend is entirely mistaken. I do not desire to legislate on the bill at all; but simply to add that the Treasury Department shall carry out the statute which has been quoted in the amendment, requiring them to use the money intended for the payment of examining surgeons in conformity with the law.

Mr. RYAN. The law to which you refer does not apply in this case, and the object of the amendment, I hold, is to make it apply; in other words, to legislate the law into this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, if the Chair understands the statement, admits that under the law as it now exists the requirement of this amendment is substantially or actually enforced.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir; the statute to which reference was made requires that the money appropriated for the payment of fees of pension examining surgeons shall be applied to that purpose. My only object in offering the amendment is that the Treasury Department may act in accordance with the law. It simply directs how the money shall be used, and it changes no law.

Mr. RANDALL. The Department has given a construction under the existing law different from that.

Mr. RYAN. Certainly; and of course the object must be, in introducing this, to change the construction of the law by the Department.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me explain. The effect is this: An officer of the Department in 1872, I believe one of the Comptrollers, by a construction of the statute to which this amendment relates, and another in 1878, I think, following in the footsteps of a previous Comptroller, gave a construction to the statutes which is not warranted, I think, whereby these pension examining surgeons are in certain cases compelled to wait months and sometimes years for their money.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the gentleman, if the law is at present as claimed by the gentleman from Illinois, then there would be no purpose in submitting the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit the Chair to finish, the connection will be made clear.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, makes the point of order that the law is not as the gentleman from Illinois now claims it to be; and the Chair is of opinion that by the terms of the proposed amendment the gentleman from Illinois himself admits that the claim of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who says that the law is not as the gentleman from Illinois says it is, is correct. The Chair is of opinion, therefore, that the proposition does change existing law, and consequently must hold that it is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House this evening. It may be that I will have nothing further to say on the bill, as I now feel inclined to leave the discussion as it now stands. I may, however, desire to discuss it further [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] for a short time. I am therefore willing to yield for a motion to adjourn. I believe I hold the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made no motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I am holding the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When the House gets quiet I will proceed. I am making a fair proposition. It is now past the usual dinner hour. I have no desire to detain the House at this time, and have no desire to make a speech this evening.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then let us vote.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I desire to say further to the House that at the proper time I shall demand a roll-call on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. McKINLEY. All right; we will give it to you.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall then want the yeas and nays taken.

Mr. McKINLEY. All right; we will give them to you.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As the House seems unwilling to allow the bill to go over until another day, I shall insist on my right to be heard now. The best answer to make to the inflammatory, the unfair, and unjust assaults that have been made upon the Democratic party in this House and the administration of the Pension Office in this debate is the roll-call, when, in my judgment, it will be shown that every Democrat, be he from the South or the North, will present a solid front in favor of voting this large amount of pensions to the Union soldier. The roll-call will demonstrate that the speeches that have been made on the other side of the House were uncalled-for and were a waste of the valuable time of the House. They were made for a purpose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let us have a vote.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If there is any virtue in the rules of the House, you shall not have a vote till I have had the time allotted to me by the rule. I wanted to say when I was interrupted that I well know the motives that actuated gentlemen on the other side to make these political harangues.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Why, did you not commence it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not commence it. I did not utter a word of a political character in opening this debate. The speech I made was confined to the question of pensions; the political elements in the debate were introduced by an assault from your side of the House, and if gentlemen had not desired to make political harangues for use in their own districts, the bill would have passed within one hour of the time that it was introduced into the House by a unanimous Democratic vote.

Mr. HEPBURN. You used up that hour yourself.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is your question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do you think the report of the Commissioner of Pensions has any political bearing, and was not that the real foundation of this whole debate?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am not going to be interrupted.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Would it be proper to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman shall have leave to print?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Illinois off the floor for the purpose of asking such consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Michigan has asked me a question, which I am willing he shall repeat that I may endeavor to answer it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My question was whether the gentleman from Illinois does not think the report of the Commissioner of Pensions bears a political character, and whether it has not precipitated this entire political debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Michigan has asked me a fair question, which I shall answer, as to whether the report of the Commissioner of Pensions did not provoke the attack which has been made by the other side on the Democratic majority. I do not believe it can properly be so construed. The Commissioner of Pensions, in entering upon the duties of his office, had a right to make known to the Secretary of the Interior, as he did, the condition of affairs as he found them to exist there. Acting in the line of his duty, in pursuance of his solemn duty, he felt compelled to describe in his report a condition of things which he believed, and which I believe he sincerely feels to-day, and which I myself conscientiously believe, at one time existed in that office. Gentlemen here have charged the present Commissioner of Pensions with making an assault on the former Commissioner of Pensions. I defy any gentleman to put his finger upon a word of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions which can be fairly designated an assault on General Dudley. There is not one word in the report which directly applies to ex-Commissioner Dudley. It is only by construction that you can claim the language points to him.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If that did not point to Commissioner Dudley, inasmuch as it was a reflection upon the official predecessors of Commissioner Black, was it not all the worse because it pointed at no particular man, and therefore might be applied to one who was absolutely innocent?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to say that the Commissioner of Pensions did not have in his mind the conduct of Commissioner Dudley in Ohio and in Indiana, as it has been shown by the evidence—by the sworn testimony of witnesses read before this House. I will not undertake to deny that he had Commissioner Dudley in his mind; but what I do maintain is that the language used in Commissioner Black's report does not apply to General Dudley, unless you yourselves believe him to have been guilty of the conduct described in that report.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Whom does it describe then?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me read the language used by Commissioner Black, to which so much exception is taken here.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me now. Let him wait until I read from the report. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the language used by the Commissioner of Pensions, of which complaint is made? But first let me say, in reply to the attacks that have been made upon him, that General Black needs no defense by me or any one else. Neither his loyalty, his character, his ability, or his fidelity to duty needs any defense whatever. The brilliant military record that he can exhibit is sufficient testimony of his loyalty, and I as his friend can without fear appeal to the people of Illinois, where he is best known, for evidence of his spotless character and of the high esteem in which he is held by civilians and soldiers of both political parties throughout that State. Therefore I do not undertake, nor shall I attempt, to defend him here. As I have said, he needs no defense. But what I do desire and shall attempt in the short time I shall occupy is to demonstrate by reference to the proof that has been produced by gentlemen who have preceded me, and by evidence which I have upon this desk before me, that every line and every word contained in General Black's report to which exception has been taken here is literally and absolutely true. I do not wonder that you gentlemen desire to prevent this dangerous testimony that you know we possess from going to the country.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not now. I have not time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think Commissioner Black is a good Commissioner, but that Commissioner Dudley's character also is entitled to be protected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What does Commissioner Black say in this report? He says this:

> At one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization.

Let me pause there for a moment. What was the political character of the personnel of that bureau under some previous administrations? When Commissioner Black came into office in March last he found one thousand six hundred and sixty-six persons employed there and of the whole number only twenty-eight were Democrats. Was he wrong, then, in charging as he did that "at one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization?" What further does Commissioner Black say? He says:

> Who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law.

Gentlemen have harped upon that language in their speeches and have challenged and defied us to produce evidence of its correctness. I point to the affidavits which have heretofore been presented in this debate and others that I shall present which show this charge to be true; not the affidavits of those "slimy creatures" in Washington who hold and hope to retain office that have been described upon this floor by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, but by men who have served upon the battlefield and who are now engaged in occupations in private life and who have claims for pensions pending in that bureau or who are on the pension-roll.

I can show that the special examiners in many cases inquired into and attempted to influence the politics of applicants. I have the sworn testimony of wounded and disabled Union soldiers who declare under oath that they were told by special examiners that unless they voted the Republican ticket their claims for pension would be in danger. I have the evidence here, but I will not take time to read it unless my statement be challenged but will ask to have it printed with my remarks. When some of the special examiners came among applicants for pensions to investigate the facts in regard to their claims many of them were told in plain and direct language that the way to obtain their pensions was to vote the Republican ticket and abandon the Democratic party. Do you want any of that testimony? [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. DUNHAM. We would like to hear it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Here is an affidavit. I will not consume time by reading the entire affidavit. I will give you the name of the soldier and the service in which he was engaged, so that you may examine for yourselves. [Cries of "Read, read!"] I have in my hand the affidavit——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. With the permission of the House I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Are these affidavits from the Pension Office?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. These affidavits were made by soldiers living in Congressional districts in Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Tennessee, and elsewhere.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Did they come out of the Pension Office?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There are affidavits of this kind lodged in the Pension Office by hundreds; and I now present a specimen of that number.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. My question was whether those affidavits came out of the Pension Office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I answer the gentleman by saying yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. How did you get them?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I got them by asking for them, as I had a right to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I ask by whose authority those affidavits are here, if they are a part of the records of the Pension Office? Had not Colonel Dudley as much right to use his office for political purposes as General Black has to furnish the private affidavits of soldiers for Democratic purposes?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As my friend is a new member and a novice in official business in Washington, I will tell him that any record in any one of the Departments is a public record and that any member of Congress has a right to have access to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Does the gentleman say that a member of Congress can go into a Department and take out affidavits without any order?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I decline to yield further. My furious and frantic friend from Indiana must possess his soul in patience for a short time. It is very unusual for him to hear of a Democratic official in the city of Washington furnishing testimony to Democrats in this House, and I have no doubt that it excites a good deal of anger on the part of the genleman. But I want him to understand that while perhaps in the past the doors of these Departments have been closed to the inquiries of Democratic members of Congress, we have now, thank God, Democratic officials in control of those Departments, and the doors stand open for the fullest inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I believe the President says that the Senate is not entitled to papers on file in the Departments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to submit to interruption. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Indiana will respect his rights.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, for the purpose of enlightening these gentlemen who seem to be in total ignorance of the facts I want to show that many of the special pension examiners did prowl around and hunt up Democratic soldiers during the last campaign; often where some poor Democratic soldier was drawing a pension a complaint would be sent to the Department which caused inquiry to be made as to whether the pension was propery granted. One of these special examiners would go into a neighborhood where such a pensioner resided and gather up from his enemies and others the gossip concerning him there; would bring the pensioner before him and by intimidation and threats frighten him out of his intention to vote the Democratic ticket, or by promises regarding his pension would attempt to seduce him from his allegiance to his party.

I have now in my hand an affidavit which I will read to the House confirming this statement. It is the affidavit of Aaron Neal, a soldier living in Franklin County, Illinois. What does he testify? He says that he is fifty-four years of age. That he was in Company C, Fifteenth Illinois, commanded by Colonel Stewart; that he was discharged from the service at Corinth, Miss., &c.; that he incurred disability, &c.; that some two years ago, as affiant was informed, some one unknown, actuated by political reasons, caused charges to be made against him, and as he understood——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Read it all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And caused his pension to be stopped; that a special examiner was sent to inquire into the question whether his pension was a proper one or not. Affiant further states that the said special examiner, a man by the name of Conner, while investigating the affiant's case inquired directly of affiant what his politics were, as to what ticket the affiant had voted, and when informed that affiant was Democrat and voted that ticket, the said Connor said to affiant, "How do you expect to draw a pension from a Government that you vote against all the time?" Affiant further states that the said Conner "led me to believe from his conversation and conduct that unless I would vote the Republican ticket my pension standing might be endangered." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The affidavit is not very legibly written and is hard to read:

And when I gave him to understand my pension depended on my services to the country during the war and not upon my politics, and that before I would abandon my political convictions I would lose my pension, he paid no further attention to my matter. Affiant further states that he is well acquainted in Franklin County; that for the last two Presidential canvasses it has been generally understood that if Democratic applicants for pensions would vote the Republican ticket their pension claims would be much surer than if they continued to vote the Democratic ticket.

This is the evidence of only one soldier.

Mr. BRUMM. Did he sign that by his mark?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is signed, sworn, and certified to.

Mr. BRUMM. I asked if it was signed by his mark?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir; it is signed with his name in full in his own writing as well as you can sign your name.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is that a part of the public records?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir.

Let me read another. You remember in the other branch of Congress a short time ago a discussion was had over the removal of an official named Stephenson, who was a chief of a division in the Pension Office. I have an affidavit now which shows the conduct of that officer, to which I wish to direct your attention for a moment. The facts are that this man in elections that have occurred in the sixteenth district of that State during several years past has left his desk in the Pension Office, taken up his headquarters in that district, and used the power of his official character for the purpose of intimidating Democratic soldiers from voting the Democratic ticket by raising fears of unfavorable action on claims, or inducing them to vote the Republican ticket by holding out hopes of the allowance of pensions.

Mr. CANNON. Will you allow me a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not now; but I will as soon as I have read this affidavit. Let me read this first. This is an affidavit of John Orrick, sworn to before G. A. Hoff. He had been a private in Company F, One hundred and thirty-sixth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, dated January 26, 1886, in which he testifies on oath as follows:

I am a pensioner of the United States of the Chicago agency. I have been personally acquainted with one Col. F. D. Stephenson, late of the Pension Bureau of Washington, D. C., for the last twenty years. During the campaign of 1884, at Flora, in Clay County, Illinois, said Stephenson met me and electioneered me to vote for one McCartney, a candidate for Congress on the Republican ticket.

Stephenson, aforesaid, knew I was a Democrat. He knew I was an ex-soldier and knew I was drawing a pension; and said Stephenson then and there referred to the fact that he, said Stephenson, was then holding a high position in the Pension Office at Washington, and said that if I would vote for said McCartney for Congress he, Stephenson, would see that my pension would be increased any time I wanted it increased, and further this deponent saith not.

Mr. Speaker, it was not necessary for him to have said anything further Now let me supplement this by another specimen of this same sort of literature.

Mr. CANNON. Now yield to me.

MR. TOWNSHEND. I have very little time.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman promised me that he would yield to me for a moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. And I ask him to comply with his promise, for the reason that he is well acquainted with Mr. Stephenson, as well acquainted as I am. He knows, as I do, that that man's character in war and in peace, at home and in Washington, is as fair as snow; and I very much doubt the propriety, and I was almost ready to say the haste, of my friend from Illinois in reading an ex parte affidavit from somebody, God knows who, for some purpose, God knows what, to try to blacken the reputation of that man, who is the peer of my colleague, or the peer of myself, or any man on this floor in honor and integrity. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I have yielded to my colleague and I have heard what he, as one of the political confrères of Mr. Stephenson, has had to say in his behalf. As you have heard my colleague's statement, I now ask you to listen to the evidence of Mr. Hord, a soldier, who served under Stephenson during the late war, and when you hear that testimony I will leave you to judge whether these affidavits are trumped up, as has been charged, or whether an attempt has been made to do him injustice or not. Listen to the testimony of one of his former soldiers. He ought not to fear injustice from a comrade in the war:

LOUISVILLE, ILL., January 26, 1886.

Hugh L. Hord, being first duly sworn, &c., deposes as follows:

That he is thirty-nine years of age, and is a farmer by occupation; that he resides 4 miles north of Louisville, Ill. During the late war he was a private of Company B, Forty-eighth Volunteer Infantry, and that Ferd. D. Stephenson was captain of said company; that he understood during the political campaign for President for the United States said Stephenson was in the Pension Department; said Stephenson was in Clay County, Illinois, during the aforesaid campaign engaged in political work in behalf of the Republican party; he made violent partisan speeches, and attempted to use his official position to influence soldiers to vote the Republican ticket. I heard him make a speech in Flora, Ill., in which he told pensioners that they were standing in their own light in voting the Democratic ticket. He left the impression on my own mind that he made these assertions in his capacity as pension official. I am at the present time a pensioner of the United States. During the campaign of 1884 I had a private conversation with Capt. F. D. Stephenson. In this conversation he attempted to make me believe that it would be to my interest as an applicant for pension to vote the Republican ticket.

I am authorized by a member of this House, who is acquainted with Mr. Hord, to state that he is a gentleman of veracity and high character.

Gentlemen, look at the spectacle. Here is a poor soldier disabled in the military service of his country; perhaps by that reason unable to maintain his wife and children; dependent upon his pension to furnish bread and meat for them; approached by a Pension Bureau official and given to understand that the food of his wife and children is dependent upon his allegiance to the Republican party.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. HEPBURN rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will not be interrupted any more.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Where do those affidavits come from?

Mr. SPRINGER. They come from the Pension Office, I presume.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They come from men as honest as any that sit on this floor.

Mr. BRUMM. Do you know them?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know some of them personally.

Mr. BRUMM. Will you name them?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not the time to read all the affidavits before me now. But these are as atoms compared with the cords of affidavits that can be produced.

Mr. LONG. When are they dated?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Some of them within the last month or two; some of them before that.

Mr. HEPBURN. They do not belong to any pension case. They are affidavits that are sent in response to the request of Mr. Black to bolster up this charge.

Mr. ROGERS. That is a side issue.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know this evidence hurts you; but the truth ought to be told.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. It is impossible in the confusion to hear the remarks that are being made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been doing what he could to preserve order.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to state that these affidavits came from the files of the Pension Office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I repeat that statement.

Mr. CANNON. They have come from the files of the Pension Office to base these charges on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not time to give evidence concerning the conduct of other special examiners. Let me reiterate that these few affidavits that I have read are but specimen bricks of a great fabric, but few of hundreds of cases that are in many instances of a more aggravated character. I have drawn your attention to Illinois because I am best acquainted there.

I have no desire to say anything in regard to General Dudley; he has been discussed by others. I know him and like him as a man. I have respect for him personally, and regard him really as a personal friend. If all that is said of his conduct in Ohio and Indiana is true his work was far less injurious to our party and is insignificant in comparison with the enormity and far-reaching effect of what was done by these drill sergeants of the Republican party, the special examiners who prowled over Congressional districts seeking to seduce Democratic Union soldiers from their allegiance to the Democratic party. It is these special examiners who have committed the greatest crime of all. I do not know whether General Dudley was aware of this conduct of the special examiners or not. I make no such charge against him.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not yield now. My time is slipping away. I want to call attention to the conduct of some of the local boards of pension examining surgeons. I will refer to a locality within my own knowledge. It is on the border of my own district in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. THOMAS]. I want to read to you evidence of what transpired there. The affidavit I now hold in my hand is from a soldier residing in Jackson County, Illinois. Hear it read:

I am a pensioner of the United States; disability, measles and results—

This is dated 22d January. Recollect I am reading the affidavit of a soldier—

I am a pensioner of the United States; disability, measles and results; am paid at the Chicago agency at $10 per month. In the fall of 1884 I made application for an increase of pension, and received an order from the Commissioner of Pensions to appear before the examining board at Du Quoin, Ill., for examination. On Wednesday, one of the examining days, I appeared before the board for examination. There was present at that time one other man, from Chester, Ill., for examination. Doctors Burgess and Renfrew, members of the board were present, and previous to the examination I was asked by Dr. Burgess—

One of the members of the examining board—

if I would support Logan and Thomas.

Logan being the Republican candidate for Vice-President, also indirectly a candidate for the United States Senate, and Mr. Thomas, Congressional candidate at the election about to take place.

To which I replied, I will not.

What became of that poor fellow?

I was then examined by Doctors Burgess and Renfrew, and Dr. Mayer, the third member of the board, came in and examined me, separate and apart from the others. After this Dr. Mayer rejoined Doctors Burgess and Renfrew for consultation. During this consultation I was separated from them by a curtain, and overheard the consultation that ensued, and from the best I could understand, Dr. Mayer was in favor of granting an increase, but Doctors Burgess and Renfrew, in an angry and disgusted tone, said they would sign no such paper and make no such recommendation. I then left the consultation room. My application for increase was not granted. And further deponent saith not.

Now, gentlemen, this is the affidavit of the soldier. You might say he was some fellow drummed up, and that he testified against these surgeons because he was disappointed in his failure to obtain from them an increase of his pension. Therefore I want you now to hear the testimony of one of those examing surgeons, confirming the evidence of the soldier. Can any better testimony be demanded than that of one of these Republican members of this examining board?

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the date of that affidavit?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The date is January 23, 1886.

Dr. E. Mayer, being first duly sworn, deposes as follows:

I am forty-three years old, a physician by profession, and have practiced my profession since 1867 in this city. I am acquainted with Dr. Warren J. Burgess and Dr. W. J. Renfro, and previous to August, 1885, was associated with them as members of the medical board for examing pensioners located at this place.

Now what does he say?

On some occasions Dr. Burgess asked applicants appearing for examination whether they would vote for Blaine and Logan. I think on some occasions Dr. Burgess expressed to applicants the hope they would support the Republican national ticket.

Oh, what a wonderful power that expression of hope would ordinarily have to the poor soldier, trembling with fear lest his little pension-money should be taken away from him, or his application for a pension or application for an increase be denied, if he should dare to vote according to his political convictions. Listen further:

These instances occurred during the Presidential election of November, 1884, and while the political canvass of that year was pending. Dr. Renfro on several occasions asked questions similar in import to those asked by Dr. Burgess as related above.

Recollect, gentlemen, this is a Republican pension examining surgeon who is testifying—they did not, except in a few instances, appoint Democrats on pension examining boards under the last administration.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Oh, yes; they did. That man is on the board still, is he not?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know whether he is or not. Now, I will read a letter from a prominent Illinois Republican politician; and I wish to say before I read it that the Republican politicians early discovered that one of the most valuable aids they could secure in a political campaign were these special examiners. It was supposed they would have more influence with soldiers applying for pensions than perhaps any other class of persons could possibly have because the fate of their claims greatly depended upon the report or recommendation of the special examiner. I will now read a letter from John R. Tanner, lately marshal of the southern district of Illinois. He is not the marshal now. I am happy to say that a Democrat now fills that place. I read this letter to show the House how highly the help of these pension examining surgeons was esteemed by the Republican leaders. I wish to say of Mr. Tanner that he is one of the shrewdest and ablest politicians, one of the best workers at the polls, one of the best managers of a campaign in the Republican party in Illinois. This letter I am about to read was written by this gentleman to General Dudley, Commissioner of Pensions. It is dated Springfield, Ill., September 20, 1884.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is that letter also from the public records?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This comes from the Pension Office.

Mr. SPRINGER. That letter was written before the election of that year.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; in September, 1884, right in the heat of the campaign. It is addressed, "Hon. W. W. Dudley, Columbus, Ohio." So it would seem that Mr. Dudley had at that time moved his headquarters from Washington to Columbus. Some question has been made here as to whether he was attempting to exercise the functions of Commissioner of Pensions while he was in Ohio. I have nothing to say upon that point, but I call attention to the fact that this letter is addressed to him in Ohio as Commissioner of Pensions. It refers to the sixteenth Congressional district of Illinois, which is now represented by my colleague, Mr. LANDES, a district which was regarded as reliably Democratic by a majority of 1,400, but in the last election, owing no doubt mainly to the agency of these pension examiners and examining surgeons, that majority was cut down to something in the neighborhood of 300. Here is the letter:

DEAR COLONEL:

The sixteenth Congressional district is composed of Wayne, Edwards, Richland, Wabash, &c.—

Enumerating the counties—

This district gave a Democratic majority in 1881 of 1,440. We have nominated Captain McCartney, the present attorney-general, in this district. We have a good show to elect him. In fact, if the election should occur now, we have him elected. The soldiers, on account of McCartney's brilliant war record and his opponent's copperhead, anti-war record, are, regardless of politics, disposed to support McCartney.

[Cries of "Good!" "Good!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I give you the whole letter. The writer proceeds:

Now what I want to say is this: In your recent assignment of examiners in Illinois you transferred Wayne, Wabash, and Edwards Counties, the three southern counties in McCartney's district, to the Saint Louis district. These counties really ought to be in this district outside of all political reasons, as all their affiliations are with the other counties of the sixteenth Congressional district, legislatively and judicially, and the regiments were made up largely in this district.

If consistent with your duty, I shall be pleased if you will attach these counties, Wayne, Wabash, and Edwards, to Major Gelwich's district. The major is a safe and discreet man, and is doing us much good. Let me hear from you soon.

JOHN R. TANNER.

Mr. Speaker, I have not time to go further into this testimony confirming the report of General Black, but I say again that these documents I have presented here are but specimen bricks, they are but atoms in the great mass of evidence that can be gathered from the affidavits of soldiers and applicants for pensions in every close Congressional district in this Union. I have not time to go further into it now; but I have produced this much to show that Commissioner Black w s right when he asserted that some of the pension officials "had for the claimants other tests than those of the law, and who required in addition to service in the field submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted," and that "examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party."

Mr. CUTCHEON. Please state whether every one of those affidavits that you have read has not been made since the Commissioner made his report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I want to say this further. Talk to me as you may please about bulldozing in the South, talk to me as you may please about Eph. Holland and ballot-box stuffing in Cincinnati, I say here and now that the cruelest instruments ever employed for corrupting the ballot-box were the men that were sent out under a Republican administration in their official character to tamper with the votes of disabled Democratic soldiers and drive them into Republican ranks by threats of depriving them of their means of support. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I care not for the conduct of Dudley. Dudley could not accomplish one-hundredth part as much as these special examiners could. One word more in regard to Commissioner Black. When he came into that bureau he entered upon the work of inaugurating reform, and one of the principal reforms he desired to effect was to put the Pension Bureau on a non-partisan basis.

A MEMBER. Is this a specimen of it—bringing these official records in here?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. General Black has been assailed here. He has a right to defend himself, and it is my right and duty as a Representative of the State of which he is a citizen to see that justice is done to him.

Mr. CUTCHEON. By ex parte affidavits to which no man can have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, as evidence of the sincerity of the President to reform the civil service, and of General Black's sincere desire to put that bureau on a non-partisan basis, I wish to call attention to a few facts. When Commissioner Black went into that office he found one thousand six hundred and sixty-six employés there, of whom only twenty-eight were Democrats. He has been there nearly twelve months and has made only one hundred and fifty-five changes in that time.

Mr. BRUMM. Was Clark included in those twenty-eight Democrats?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Clark was expelled—turned out, or perhaps resigned.

Mr. BRUMM. He was not included in the twenty-eight?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Then he would make the number twenty-nine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Commissioner Black tells me that while he has made only one hundred and fifty-five changes, and appointed only one hundred and forty-two Democrats of that number, he regrets that he has not yet been able to remove at least one-half of the entire force in that bureau, in order that the two political parties might be equally represented there, and that Democratic soldiers might have as fair an opportunity for a favorable consideration of their cases as Republican soldiers have. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not wish to be understood as fully agreeing with the administration in its method of purifying the civil service by retaining so many Republican office-holders. I am one of those who believe that the country is safest when the reins of Government are intrusted to Democratic hands. But while I believe it better that a larger number of removals should be made, yet I have no doubt of the sincerity of the belief of the President that he is pursuing that policy in regard to the civil service which is wisest and best for the future welfare of the country, and in accordance with his public pledges prior to and since his election.

I hope that General Black will go on and turn out all the men who have misused their offices in the manner I have described here, and I trust he will continue the removals in that Department until he secures at least as many Democratic officials in the Pension Office as there are Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, I have lost so much time by interruptions that I have failed to refer to several points on which I intended to comment. I wish now to say that I can prove by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the Democratic party since it came into power in this House has shown itself to be more liberal in its appropriations for pensions to the soldiers than Republican Congresses ever were. To whom do the soldiers owe the arrearage-of-pension money that they have received? What are the facts in regard to the arrearage-of-pension bill which was passed some years ago? I will give them to you.

The first bill, providing arrears of pensions, was introduced December 9, 1874, in the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Pensions. Congress was then Republican in both Houses. What did the Republican Senate do with that arrears-of-pension bill? The bill was reported back from the committee to the Senate with an adverse report on the 26th of January, 1875. Hon. D. D. Pratt, Republican Senator from Indiana, who was chairman of the Committee on Pensions, said in reporting the bill adversely:

> I am instructed by the committee to report adversely on Senate bill No. 985, providing for payment of arrears of pension. The committee learn on correspondence with the Pension Office that it will require upward of $9,000,000 to meet the requisitions of the bill. For economic reasons—

"For economic reasons!" There was no consideration for the justice of the bill—no consideration whatever for the interest of the poor soldier, but—

> For economic reasons, as well as others, the committee think the bill should not be entertained.

Senator Pratt moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, and the motion was carried in the household of those who pretend to be par excellence the friends of the soldier. In the House, which was Republican in the Forty-third Congress, numerous petitions were received from soldiers and their widows praying for the passage of an act to pay them arrears of pensions. But, sir, they were buried in the committee-room where they died, and a deaf ear was turned to all these prayers. The arrears-of-pension act was thus effectually killed by the Republicans in the Forty-third Congress, when it was supposed the measure would cost only $9,000,000.

What followed? In the next Congress, the Forty-fourth, thank God, the House of Representatives was Democratic; and the soldiers ought to thank God for it also. In that Congress many petitions and memorials were received, as in the previous Congress, from soldiers asking for the payment of their pensions. These were referred to the appropriate committee and promptly and favorably considered. The committee formulated a bill to pay the arrears of pensions and reported it to the House for passage. General A. V. Rice, of Ohio, a Democrat and a gallant Union soldier, who had lost a leg in the service, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The motion of General Rice prevailed in that "Copperhead, Southern-brigadier House of Representatives," as it has been described by Republican politicians. The pension-arrearage bill was stricken down in a Republican Congress, but was lifted up and passed in the Democratic House of the Forty-fourth Congress. General Rice's motion prevailed, the rules were suspended, and the bill passed the House March 3, 1877.

The Senate was Republican by a large majority. Let us see what became of the bill there?

Mr. McKINLEY. Has the gentleman the vote in the House on that bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Immediately on the bill being read in the Senate Mr. INGALLS, a Republican Senator from Kansas, moved that it lie on the table; and his motion was agreed to.

Thus this Democratic bill to pay the soldiers the arrears of pensions was killed by a Republican Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How many Democrats and how many Republicans voted for that bill in the House?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am now dealing with the record of the Republican party. Now listen to the record of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But you are not giving the record.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not propose to be interrupted. The bill was killed in the Forty-third Congress, a Republican Congress. It was killed again in the Republican Senate of the Forty-fourth Congress. Then came the Forty-fifth Congress. The bill as it came from the Pension Committee was not exactly in suitable form, it contained no appropriation; nevertheless, the Democratic House, to save time, passed it, and in a few days Mr. Sparks, a Democratic member from Illinois, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill to pay the arrears of pensions, which was passed, the amount appropriated being $25,000,000.

The Democratic House of the Forty-fifth Congress passed a bill making an appropriation of $25,000,000 to pay the soldiers' arrears of pensions, whereas the Forty-third Congress, a Republican Congress, and the Republican Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress killed all bills for the same purpose when it was supposed the expenditure would not be much more than one-third of that amount.

Mr. RYAN. The majority of the Democratic votes cast were against the passage of that bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It was passed by Republican votes; a majority of the Democrats voted against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, and voted for the bill. A majority of that House was Democratic; and that bill was passed in that House—the bill which a Republican Senate had scorned and laid on the table.

Contrast the work done for pensioners in the Forty-seventh Congress, which was Republican, with the next, the Forty-eighth Congress, which was Democratic.

The Republican Forty-seventh Congress passed only one hundred and ninety special pension acts, whereas the last Democratic Congress, the Forty-eighth, passed five hundred and twenty-four. These figures show who are the best friends of the soldier.

This is but a tithe of what we have done for the soldier. I have not time to go over this whole record. I would be glad to do so. I say again, I can prove by the Congressional records that the Democratic party in Congress has been more liberal in its appropriations of pensions and bounties to the Union soldiers than the Republicans have ever been.

I have not forgotten the time—I think it was in the Forty-second Congress—when the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers—a just and proper measure—was lost by reason of the veto of a Republican President or his refusal to sign the bill, and why? Because, as was alleged, it would cost too much money! At the same time that same Republican President in 1869 had signed a bill which practically took $600,000,000 out of the pockets of the people of this country and put that amount in the pockets of the bondholders by declaring that bonds which were then worth but 75 cents on the dollar in specie should be paid at par in coin. When the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], in a past Congress, introduced a bill proposing to do the same thing for the soldier that a Republican Congress did for the bondholder he was laughed at and ridiculed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Has the committee reported that bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend must not get excited. Notwithstanding the outcry against the bill equalizing the bounties of the Union soldiers on account of the large amount which it involved, yet in the first Democratic House which appeared here since the war—the Forty-fourth Congress—that bill was passed and sent to the Republican Senate, where it was indefinitely postponed and killed. If the Republican Senate had been as friendly to the soldier as the Democratic House he would have received his equalized-bounty money long ago.

Gentlemen talk about the Democratic party as if it is but temporarily in power. Let me tell you, gentlemen, the Democratic party has come here to stay. [Applause.] With false pretenses and misrepresentations you have deluded many people in the North into the belief that the Democratic party could not be safely intrusted with power, and thereby for a long time kept us out of power. By corrupting the ballot-box in the North and the unlawful employment of deputy marshals, by the use of the bayonet and intimidation in the South, by fraud, forgery, and perjury of members of returning boards you deprived the American people of their rightful choice for the Presidency in 1876 and seated a usurper in his place.

The most deadly perils which threaten the permanency of the Republic are the shameful methods employed to debauch the elective franchise. The present administration can accomplish no greater reform, can confer upon the country no happier blessing, than to correct the abuses of Federal power at elections. As far as is within the legitimate exercise of its power it should uphold the purity of the ballot-box and insist upon absolute obedience to the sovereign will of the people as there expressed. To this end the polls should be kept free from the intimidation of bayonets, of the unlawful use of deputy marshals, and of all other elements of force. The result of elections should be honestly ascertained and freed from every suspicion of fraud, forgery, or bribery, and see to it that each citizen of the Republic shall count for one, and that no man shall count for more than one. Adhere with unflinching determination to that cardinal principle upon which our first great leader, Jefferson, founded the Democratic party:

A jealous care of the rights of election by the people; a mild and safe corrective of abuses, which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided.

Absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority—the vital principle of republics from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The following are copies of the affidavits from which extracts were read by Mr. TOWNSHEND, and which he had the consent of the House to print in full:

VERGENNES, ILL., January 22, 1886.

I, William Madden, being duly sworn, depose and say as follows:

I am forty-seven years of age, occupation farmer, and my post-office address is Vergennes, Jackson County, Ill.

I am a pensioner of the United States; disability, measles and results, and paid at the Chicago agency at $10 per month. In the fall of 1884 I made application for an increase and received an order from the Commissioner of Pensions to appear before the examining board at Duquoin, Ill., for examination. On Wednesday, one of the examination days, I appeared before the board for examination. There was present at that time one other man from Chester, Ill., for examination. Drs. Burgess and Renfrow, members of the board, were present, and previous to the examination I was asked by Dr. Burgess if I would support Logan and Thomas at the election about to take place, to which I replied, "I will not." I was then examined by Drs. Burgess and Renfrow, and Dr. Mayer, the third member of the board, came in and examined me separate and apart from the others, and after this Dr. Mayer rejoined Drs. Burgess and Renfrow for consultation.

During this consultation I was separated from them only by a curtain and overheard the conversation that ensued, and from the best I could understand Dr. Mayer was in favor of granting an increase, but that Doctors Burgess and Renfrow, in an angry and disgusted tone, said they would sign no such papers and make no such recommendation.

I then left the consultation room, my application for increase was not granted, and further the deponent saith not.

I am acquainted with Dr. Warren J. Burgess and Dr. J. W. Renfrow, and previous to August, 1885, was associated with them as members of the medical board for the examination of pensioners located at this place.

On some occasions Dr. Burgess asked applicants appearing for examination whether they would vote for Blaine and Logan. I think that on some occasions Dr. Burgess expressed to applicants the hope that they would support the Republican national ticket.

These instances occurred previous to the Presidential election of November, 1884, and while the political canvass of that year was pending.

Dr Renfrow on several occasions asked questions similar in import to those asked by Dr. Burgess and related above.

Q. E. BROWNING, Special Examiner.

LOUISVILLE, ILL., January 26, 1886.

Hugh Hord, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

That he is thirty-nine years of age; is a farmer by occupation; resides 4 miles north of Louisville, Ill. During the late war he was a private in Company B, Forty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry; that Ford D. Stephenson was captain of said company; that he understood that during the late political campaign for President of the United States said Stephenson was an official of the Pension Department; said Stephenson was in Clay County, Illinois, during the aforesaid campaign engaged in political work in behalf of the Republican party. He made violent partisan speeches, and attempted to use his official position to influence soldiers to vote the Republican ticket. I heard him make a speech in Flora, Ill., in which he told pensioners that they were standing in their own light in voting the Democratic ticket. He left the impression on my mind that he made these assertions in his capacity of a pension official. I am at the present time a pensioner of the United States.

During the political campaign of 1884 I had a private conversation with Capt. F. D. Stephenson. In this conversation he attempted to make me believe that it would be to my interest as an applicant for a pension to vote the Republican ticket.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Clay County:

Now, on the 26th day of January, 1886, personally appeared before the undersigned, G. A. Hoff, county judge in and for said county and State, John Orrick, late private of Company F, One hundred and thirty-sixth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers of late war, who, being duly sworn according to law, upon his oath doth depose and say, I am a pensioner of the United States of the Chicago agency; I have been personally acquainted with one Col. F. D. Stephenson, late of the Pension Bureau at Washington, D. C., for the last twenty years. During the campaign of 1884, at Flora, in Clay County, Illinois, said Stephenson met me and electioneered me to vote for one James McCartney, then a candidate for congress upon the Republican ticket. Stephenson aforesaid knew I was a Democrat. He knew I was an ex-soldier, and knew I was drawing a pension; and said Stephenson then and there referred to the fact that he, said Stephenson, was then holding a high position in the Pension Office at Washington, and said that if I would vote for said McCartney for Congress he, Stephenson, would see that my pension would be increased any time I wanted it increased; and further deponent saith not.

G. A. HOFF, County Judge.

Official certificate on file in Pension Department.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
Franklin County, ss:

Aaron Neal, being first duly sworn, on his oath states, that he is now in the fifty-fourth year of his age; that he was born in the county of Franklin, in the State of Illinois, and has always resided in said county with the exception of about one year, which was spent in the Army; that he was a member of Company C, Fifteenth Illinois Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Stewart; that he was discharged from the service at Corinth, Miss., A. D. 1863, on account of disability contracted while in the line of his duty; that he is now drawing a pension for same disability. Affiant further states that some two years ago, as affiant is informed, some one to affiant unknown, but as affiant believes for political reasons only, undertook to have his pension stopped; that the result of said step was to bring affiant's case before Special Examiner Conner some time in the summer or fall of A. D. 1884.

Affiant further states that the said special examiner, who claimed to be Conner, while investigating affiant's case inquired of affiant what his politics were, or what ticket affiant voted, and when informed that affiant was a Democrat and voted that ticket, the said Conner said to affiant: "How do you expect to draw a pension from a government that you vote against all the time?"

Affiant further states that the said Conner led me to believe from his conversation and conduct that unless I would vote the Republican ticket my pension standing might be endangered, and when I gave him to understand that I understood my pension depended upon my service to the country during the war and not upon my politics, and that before I would abandon my political convictions I would lose my pension, he paid no more attention to my pension matter.

Affiant further states that he is well acquainted in Franklin County; that for the last two Presidential canvasses it has been generally understood that if Democratic applicants for pension would vote the Republican tickets their pension claims would be much surer than if they continued to vote the Democratic tickets; that this impression seemed to be made by nearly all the leading Republicans, but whether such policy emanated from the head of the Pension Department affiant does not know. And further affiant saith not.

AARON NEAL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public, by the above-named Aaron Neal; and I hereby certify that I am personally acquainted with said Aaron Neal and believe him to be creditable and worthy of belief.

Mr. RANDALL. I take the floor in my own right and yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] if he will make the motions necessary to pass this bill to-night.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope the Democratic party will not permit a speech of the kind just made to go out without giving an opportunity to reply. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] No one dared to make it where there was a legitimate opportunity for reply. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will have plenty of time to reply hereafter.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon Saturday, which has been set apart for debate only. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would be glad if further time could be given.

Mr. RANDALL. I am on the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have but given an atom of what I have behind. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois does not seem to desire to call the previous question, and therefore I take the responsibility of making that motion myself. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before that is done I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I will say I will not abuse that privilege by introducing anything personal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The vote on the passage of the bill under the rules will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 241, nays 1, not voting 81, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk for the remainder of the day:

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. BYNUM with Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, with Mr. HEARD.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I am paired with Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, but knowing he would vote in favor of the bill I have recorded my vote in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, would certainly vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. PETTIBONE. So I have stated.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. WAITE, who is absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CANNON. So would Mr. BUCK, who is necessarily absent.

Mr. BYNUM. I am paired with Mr. WAKEFIELD; but as he would vote in the affirmative if present, I have voted in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. My colleague, Mr. HARMER, who is absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a privileged report.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations be allowed to proceed to-morrow with what is known as the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, otherwise it will have to go over till Tuesday next.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the title of the bill. I move to strike out the last three words.

I have not felt disposed to participate in this debate until the recent exhibition which has been made in the presence of the House. I desire to make a very few observations now. I desire to call the attention of the House to the most extraordinary spectacle which has been presented here during the hour which preceded the vote upon the bill.

It explains other proceedings which have taken place in this House. This debate has been, so far as it has been legitimate, upon the question of the exhibition of partisanship by a public officer while he is occupying a public office. There has been much language of reprobation used by gentlemen on the other side of the House upon that subject; and yet during the last two days the Commissioner of Pensions, in violation of the rules of this House, has been upon the floor of the House. To that nobody has made objection. But to-day the purpose of his presence here has been revealed. What was it? It was to furnish to gentlemen upon the other side, not in their official capacity, not to this House, but to individual members of the House, the records of the Pension Office for the purpose of enabling them to make partisan discourse.

The files of the Pension Office seem to have been plundered, to have been brought here and left in unofficial hands, to be examined and used, not by the whole House, but by individual members of it, for partisan purposes. And in addition to that, a thing which was reserved for the last closing hour of the debate, when it was thought that no reply could be made and no comment uttered, for the production of affidavits——

Mr. CASWELL (from his seat). Ex parte affidavits too.

Mr. REED, of Maine. To blacken the character of men who never had an opportunity to defend themselves.

If there is any basis of truth it is the right of cross-examination and the right to face one's accusers; and yet the Commissioner of Pensions has furnished to a member of this House things which are presented here as the official files of his Department, which are one-sided affidavits, and the facts themselves show that every one of them was produced after the Commissioner had made his charges in that party pamphlet which he calls his "report." [Applause on the Republican side].

Is that the example of reform that is set to us? Just think of it a moment. A party that is loudly proclaiming its determination to divorce this office from partisan purposes and partisan action has its Commissioner of Pensions brought upon the floor to furnish and leave in unofficial hands the records of his office!

Worse than that. A deliberate plan is made by the members on the other side to have ex parte affidavits dragged here at a time when they believed no opportunity for an answer could be found; and when I appealed to the Democratic party not to permit a performance like that to take place without reply, I was met with a ripple of gentle laughter from these earnest, high-minded, patriotic reformers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I know how gentlemen on the other side feel, or a large part of them. I know that they sympathize with what I say. I know that they feel they have been discredited as well as the rest of us as citizens of this Republic by such an exhibition as we have just witnessed.

For my part I do not care to deal in ancient history, whether it begins a year back or whether it goes back to the time of Howell Cobb. I prefer to deal with the present. What a spectacle is this which is now presented. I congratulate the Democratic party that only one speaker on that side made use of ex parte affidavits, obtained in such a manner, to blacken men who can not be heard.

It would be impossible for me, Mr. Speaker, to add anything to the plain facts of this case.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] so much time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I shall only require five or ten minutes.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I yield such time as the gentleman may need.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I only want to occupy a very short time.

Touching these papers, the public records which have been brought in here, while I am not permitted to refer to what is taking place at the other end of this Capitol, yet the President's message is in the possession of the country and in the possession of the House, at least of its members, in which he withholds the files of the Departments from the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Commissioner of Pensions, so wise, so able, so thoroughly conversant with all the proprieties of official life and of official action, a man of mature age, the subordinate to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of the Interior—I feel assured that the Commissioner of Pensions, I will say to the gentleman from Maine, would never have furnished from the files of the Pension Office those ex parte affidavits to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], and the letter-books and other public records of his Department, unless he had the direct order of the President of the United States so to do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my colleague allow one single word?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It seems to me that my colleague and another gentleman on that side desire to create the impression that I was the only Democratic member of the House who presented these affidavits to have them read before the House and the country. Do gentlemen forget that they were introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], and similar papers by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and yet no one took exception then to their introduction, but their criticism is reserved for me, who made use of them in the closing hours of the debate. I know my colleague would not wish to do me any injustice.

Mr. CANNON. My friend will acquit me of any discourtesy to him. At that moment I was not referring to my friend, but was referring rather to the Commissioner of Pensions and the President of the United States, calling the attention of the House and the country to what must be the fact under the official proprieties, that these records that are under the direction and control of the President of the United States are withheld from members on one side of this legislative body and are produced here to my colleague, no doubt under the order of the President, and also to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and others.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to my colleague I am satisfied the President knows nothing whatever of the production of these documents. They were obtained by me in the Pension Office, and I will say I do not really believe these affidavits are part of the official files. They are documents deposited there coming from all parts of the country. I obtained them at the same time with the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

A MEMBER. He has confessed it now.

Mr. CANNON. I understood my colleague to say the affidavits he read were from the files of the Pension Office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I may have made a mistake in that.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; and I understood him to say that they had more of them there; that these were but specimens of the vast mass of affidavits that he could produce and that were there on file.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I stated so.

Mr. CANNON. If it be true that the President of the United States did not direct the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions to produce these affidavits, well and good. I could conceive of no other mode by which they could get here; and even if they had come here by that mode I undertake to say that the action would be unprecedented.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most unfair and reckless use of the garbled records and culled ex parte affidavits from the files of the Pension Office. When did the House by resolution or otherwise ask for them? Why are they furnished solely to Democratic members? Why are they away from the depository in the Pension Office provided by law for them, floating around loose in the hands of individual members on the other side? Will they be destroyed in whole or part or will they be returned to the Pension Office? Have they been read in whole or have they been artfully culled and selected or parts of them suppressed, and through such suppression or the suppression of other papers belonging with them the false appears true or the true false? Who knows?

The light of cross-examination has never fallen upon them.

Is this Democratic reform? Is this Democratic fairness? Are these the methods of an administration that has been announcing for a year, "I am holier than thou?"

Mr. Speaker, how different has been the action of this House touching its records.

The other day a subpœna duces tecum, from one of the highest courts of the land, was served on the Clerk of this House, to produce a record of this House in the court for the purpose of examination and being offered in evidence. The subpœna was reported to the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee and a resolution of the House passed that the record should not go from its custody in the hands of the Clerk or otherwise; but that the court, through its officer, with the attorneys present, should have power to examine that record within the Capitol in the place where the records are kept.

Mr. Speaker, one word in conclusion. Colonel Stevenson, of Illinois, was for many years chief of one of the divisions in the Pension Office, a man of excellent ability, a faithful officer, a man whose character is as good as that of any man here or in service under the Executive; a man in war or peace the peer of any one, the Commissioner of Pensions not excepted. As a Representative from Illinois I can not be silent when my colleague, Mr. TOWNSHEND, seeks to blacken his character by such ex parte affidavits as he has read, made by whom we know not and procured by means we know not of, and whether they be private property of the Commissioner of Pensions or a part of the files in the office conducted by his agents, swift to curry favor with power, I care not; in any event they are ex parte, unworthy of credibility, and will not be received by the House or the country to blacken in the slightest degree the character of Colonel Stevenson.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. It will be remembered that when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] introduced an affidavit a little while ago it was in order to show that the late Commissioner of Pensions had prostituted his office to political purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not introduce it for any such purpose. I stated distinctly I had nothing to say against Colonel Dudley.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not care what the gentleman said as to that. The whole tenor of his remarks, the whole purpose he had was to blacken the name and the fame of that gentleman, and to do it, too, in a cowardly way, without giving him any opportunity of being heard or of his friends being heard in his defense.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman means by the term "cowardly"——

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not yield. I withdraw the expression.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If he means the word "cowardly" in a personal sense I want to know it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have withdrawn it; although I do not suppose it would need a definition at my hands for the gentleman's use. The purpose in my judgment was to blacken the name of this officer, to show that he had used those under his command for political purposes.

Now the present Commissioner goes out upon a lark. He undertakes to make some political capital for his political friends and political party. He makes certain charges in a paper he calls his report. It becomes necessary when that is challenged to get some kind of evidence to sustain it, and this is the kind he has, such as was read here. Attached to the paper the gentleman from Illinois read was one he did not read, which explains how that affidavit was obtained. It explains the character of the affidavit and the purposes for which it is to be used or rather not used. The letter which is attached to that paper is marked "private." Will you look at it and examine it for yourself? It was a private letter that a gentleman named Youngblood addressed to the Commissioner, and it is attached to the affidavit.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I never noticed the letter.

Mr. HEPBURN. That letter is as follows; I copied it:

KENTON, ILL., January 29, 1886.

Mark the date, Mr. Speaker, January 29, 1886.

Hon. JOHN C. BLACK,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: At the request of Doctors Rogers and Bundy—

Who are those gentlemen? I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] if they are not members of the examining boards that this Commissioner has appointed?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They do not live in my district.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask him if they are not officers of the United States, appointed by this very man who is now using them for political purposes to sustain and bolster up this assault which he has made upon his political adversaries? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I read further from this precious "private" document:

At the request of Doctors Rogers and Bundy, I herewith inclose affidavit of Aaron Neal, which I think fully substantiates your report as Commissioner—

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The Commissioner was evidently seeking for something to sustain his assault on the Republican party, and he undertook to use these officers that he had himself appointed for the purpose of securing such evidence; and the agent they selected wrote this letter congratulating him upon his success in finding just that kind of dirt that was required to help him in this emergency. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

The letter continues:

which I think fully substantiates your report as Commissioner. I will send others as soon as made.

"Others as soon as made."

Mr. BOUTELLE. They appear to have had a factory.

Mr. HEPBURN. This letter is signed, "Yours truly, F. M. Youngblood." Yes, sir; that is the method; that is the way these gentlemen propose to blacken the name of Commissioner Black's predecessor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has forty minutes left.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he desires.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to call the previous question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not yield for that purpose. I have a remark to make, and then I will call the previous question, as the gentleman desires.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that what I said in the opening has been amply justified. More than that, it will be seen that what I said hopefully of the attitude of the Democratic party upon this subject has also been justified; for even the gentleman who perpetrated, or who assisted in perpetrating, this thing has himself expressed, so far as we could expect him to do it, his feeling of doubtfulness as to the transaction. When you contrast this freedom of exhibition on this occasion with the reticence of a higher functionary, when you compare these specimens of the means that have been taken to remove men from office under this new plan of civil-service reform with what probably exists elsewhere, and which a high public functionary has thought fit to conceal, you can understand not only what this debate has meant, but also what is the meaning of high public transactions elsewhere. Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman sits down I wish to ask him a question. Does he assume that we have read here a public record?

Mr. REED. Oh, I do not assume at all. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], on his responsibility as a member of Congress, standing in his seat, stated that they were the records of the Pension Office, and he has admitted it in this debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I said also, in answer to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that if I had stated that they were part of the records or the files of the Pension Office I might be mistaken—that they were not, perhaps, official papers, but were simply deposited in the Pension Office. I so state now, and if I stated otherwise in the hurry of debate I may have been mistaken.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the gentleman regrets it, that is very well.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow me to say further, that these affidavits, as the gentleman himself must see, could not be a part of the public records of the Pension Office. They were personal papers of the head of that bureau; that is clear; and no other interpretation can be placed on them.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What were they brought here for? Who brought them here?

Mr. SOWDEN. They were brought here for the purposes named in the letter read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Now, will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] kindly tell me whether that letter-book from which copies of letters have been read so freely, was or was not a part of the records of the Pension Office?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not able to answer.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I am, for I have examined it; and it is; or else it is the private letter-book of Mr. Dudley.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had supposed, and suppose still, from a hasty glance I gave at that book as displayed here on the table yesterday, that it was the letter-press book of the Commissioner of Pensions, which he did not think proper to take away from the office; that it is not a public record, because there are in it matters which manifestly do not pertain to the current business of his office.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then if it was not a violation of public decency to bring it here, it was a violation of private decency.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it was left there publicly, I do not see why any gentleman may not take it up and use it.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine demands the previous question on his amendment.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I desire the floor in my own right. I want to bring the House to a vote on laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in the course of his remarks, held up an affidavit of one Aaron Neal, and indorsed that man as an honorable soldier—the peer, as I understood him to say, of any one.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I said nothing whatever of the standing of Mr. Neal. I found his affidavit accompanying the proof which I had before me.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not the gentleman know that Aaron Neal is a convicted felon, who served a term in the penitentiary of his State for cowardly murder committed in the night? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am informed that is so, and that the man Youngblood, who prepared and sent the affidavits here, was a "copperhead," and during the war had a child born whom he called Jefferson Davis. Is not that true?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman has asked me a question, and I want to answer. Aaron Neal was a soldier in the late war——

Mr. HEPBURN. Was he not a convicted felon?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I never heard it except from your lips.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then you have answered my question, and I do not yield further.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I propose now——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa does not yield further.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is very unfair for the gentleman to refuse me in this way an opportunity to reply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think the gentleman, if he seeks to be fair——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield, and the Chair must enforce the rules.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now return the floor to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I withdraw my motion to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The pending question, then, is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give me an opportunity for a brief explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to be exactly fair toward both sides.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me I will resume the floor and will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Aaron Neal is a citizen of Franklin County, in my district, but some 60 miles from where I reside. I only know him as I know thousands of people in that vicinity. I know that he was a soldier. I never before heard that he was convicted of any crime whatever. So far as Mr. Youngblood is concerned, I say now and here that he is the peer of the member from Iowa—as honorable a man as the gentleman from Iowa. My colleague [Mr. MORRISON], who stands near me, knows as well as I that Mr. Youngblood is as honorable, upright, and patriotic a citizen of this Republic as the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOPKINS. How was he during the war?

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, it was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks unanimous consent that so much time as may be necessary to-morrow be devoted to the consideration of what is known as the urgency deficiency bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think it will take more than one hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the order will be made.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6397) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

TELEPHONE INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following as the select committee to investigate the facts concerning the alleged ownership of Pan-Electric Telephone stock by certain public officials: Mr. BOYLE, Mr. OATES, Mr. EDEN, Mr. HALL, Mr. HALE, Mr. RANNEY, Mr. MILLARD, Mr. HANBACK, and Mr. MOFFATT.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOUK, for five days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. KING (at 7 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. W. W. BROWN: Petition of sundry old soldiers and others, citizens of Bradford, Pa., for the passage of House bill 4902—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, memorial of the West Branch Lumber Exchange, protesting against the placing of lumber on the free-list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BUCK: Petition of 281 representative citizens of Tolland and Henderson Counties, Connecticut, for scientific temperance instruction in all schools under control of Federal Government—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. J. M. CAMPBELL: Petition of citizens of Somerset County, Pennsylvania, asking the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools under the control of the Federal Government—to the same committee.

By Mr. CAREY: Petition of citizens of Fremont County, Wyoming, praying passage of a general pension law—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COLLINS: Two memorials from Boston, Mass., concerning the abolition of the Presidency—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CRAIN: Petition of 146 members of Franklin Assembly, No. 2376, Knights of Labor, Galveston, Tex., favoring the engineers' plan for securing deep water at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Petition of citizens of Osceola County, Michigan, in favor of pension legislation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions of the Clinton County (Michigan) Wool-growers' Association in favor of the restoration of the tariff of 1867 on wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FELTON: Petition of Anti-Coolie Club of Santa Clara County, California, in favor of the abrogation of the Burlingame treaty—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FISHER: Memorial of Local Assembly of Knights of Labor, No. 3396, of Cheboygan, Mich., asking for liberal appropriations for public improvements—to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1886.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. 368) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," approved May 9, 1882;

A bill (H. R. 5546) for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.; and

A bill (H. R. 5547) for the erection of a public building at Savannah, Ga.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BELFAST, ME.

The bill (H. R. 1027) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me., was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. The Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have already reported, and there is on the Calendar now, a Senate bill exactly the same in terms with that bill, and I ask that the House bill may take the place on the Calendar of Senate bill 1474, Order of Business 270, and that the latter bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the House bill take the place on the Calendar of the Senate bill, both being on the same subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the House bill in the same language?

Mr. FRYE. Exactly.

Mr. HALE. It is the same bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill (S. 1474) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me., be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of 14 clergymen, 10 physicians, 14 lawyers, 34 teachers, 118 business men, and 42 officers of temperance and other societies of Aroostook, Penobscot, Washington, and Piscataquis Counties, Maine, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools, supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I have received, addressed to me personally, what is in fact a petition to Congress, signed by members of C. D. Sandford Post, of the Grand Army of the Republic, and a large number of other ex-soldiers, in favor of the passage of the bill increasing the pensions of soldiers who have lost one or both arms. I ask that it may be referred, although it is addressed to me personally, to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be received, if there be no objection, and so referred.

Mr. DAWES. I have also received, in precisely the same form, a remonstrance against the passage of the bill increasing postage upon fourth-class mail matter, signed by Joseph Breck & Sons and a large number of other men in the city of Boston. I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of 131 representative citizens of Allegany County, New York, and a petition of 219 representative citizens of Chautauqua County, New York, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Scipio monthly meeting of Friends, New York, praying for the passage of Senate bill 355 to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Albany and Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIKE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Nashua, N. H., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I have addressed to me personally a letter in the nature of a petition, and intended to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands in connection with a resolution which I introduced in the Senate some time ago. The letter or petition is as follows:

FORT MYERS, FLORIDA, February 26, 1884.

DEAR SIR: In common with all Florida our section has been victimized by the land-sharks, and the United States Government has suffered the loss of millions.

By fraud and perjury large areas of land have been secured to the State, the agents making selections obtaining pay in land, being an inducement to those creatures to swear that high and dry lands are overflowed and swamp and should be set apart to the State.

The villainy is not confined to Monroe County, but, so far as I have investigated, extends all over the State. Applicants for homesteads are told that such and such land belongs to the State, though common sense teaches that the land has not been under water since Noah's day, and, knowing as much of our country's laws as the scoundrels do, naturally wonder how such moral obliquity has been tolerated by a respectable government. Such special agents as have been sent here to re-examine have, like the notorious jack-leg lawyer, thought it prudent to take fees on both sides. I can show by the testimony of the respectable people of this country, unimpeachable witnesses, that ninety-five out of every hundred tracts selected as swamp and overflowed, have not and never had any standing water on them.

This wholesale robbery requires such treatment as New York gave Tweed. An agent to do his duty must come upon the ground with moral force enough to withstand bribes and blandishments, and no man who has benefited by the steal should be allowed upon the witness-stand. Samples of fraudulent selections can be found all around Fort Myers, up the Caloosahatchee, and, in fact, throughout the whole of South Florida. O tempora! O mores!

Yours, truly,

JAMES KELLUM, M. D.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL.

I have also another letter in the nature of a petition from one F. C. M. Boggess, of Fort Ogden, Manatee County, Florida, which states as follows: There was selected by the State of Florida as swamp and overflowed lands, on December 17, 1885, all the United States lands in townships 34 and 35 south, of range 29 east, particularly sections 28, 29, 31, 32. These lands have been recently settled upon as homestead lands. The lands are high hills, as high as the hills around Tallahassee, and have never been overflowed since the old man Noah made his advent from the ark, if then.

This letter states that large numbers of people have been defrauded out of their homestead rights and their settlement rights under improper selections. Without knowing anything in regard to the truth of these statements, I have thought it proper that the rights of all citizens should be enforced when complaint shall be made, and that these papers should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which I ask may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the papers will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWELL. I present three memorials of the State board of agriculture of New Jersey, and ask that they be read and appropriately referred. They are very short.

The following memorial of the State board of agriculture of New Jersey was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in National Congress assembled:

Whereas the extreme low price of pork (which is one of the largest crops of the American farmer) is seriously affecting the profits of agriculture in this country; and

Whereas the President, in his recent message to Congress, says, "I regret to say that the restrictions upon the importation of our pork into France continue, notwithstanding the abundant demonstrations of the absence of sanitary danger in its use, but I entertain strong hopes that, with a better understanding of the matter, this vexatious prohibition will be removed; it would be pleasing to be able to say as much with respect to Germany, Austria, and other countries where such food products are absolutely excluded, without present prospect of reasonable change;" and

Whereas the President does not in his message give the information as to the reasons or cause why American pork is absolutely excluded in Germany, Austria, and other countries: Therefore,

Resolved, That the State board of agriculture of New Jersey do hereby request our representatives in Congress to make diligent investigation into this matter, and endeavor to secure such changes as may be necessary to relieve this important industry from the restrictions now imposed upon it by other countries.

By order of the New Jersey State board of agriculture.

E. BURROUGH, President.

Attest:

WM. S. TAYLOR, Secretary.

The following memorial of the State board of agriculture of New Jersey was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in National Congress assembled:

Whereas contagious diseases, such as pleuro-pneumonia among cattle, cholera and other diseases among swine, exist to such an extent in our midst as to seriously affect the profits of agriculture; and

Whereas our State laws fail to eradicate these diseases, on account of their continual introduction by diseased cattle from other States passing over or resting on our soil: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this State board of agriculture request our members in National Congress to enact such laws as will, in co-operation with those passed by the different States, prevent the transmission of these diseases from one State to another, and quickly and thoroughly eradicate them from our whole land.

By order of the New Jersey State Board of Agriculture.

E. BURROUGH, President.

Attest:

W. S. TAYLOR, Secretary.

The following memorial of the State board of agriculture of New Jersey was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in National Congress assembled:

Whereas the prosperity of the country largely depends upon the economical and intelligent administration of its agricultural interests: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this State board of agriculture request our members in Congress to elevate the office of Commissioner of Agriculture to the dignity of a Cabinet position, to the end that its influence may be commensurate with the importance of agriculture to the life and prosperity of the nation.

By order of the New Jersey State board of agriculture.

E. BURROUGH, President.

Attest:

WM. S. TAYLOR, Secretary.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of 730 representative citizens of Warren, Sussex, and Hunterdon Counties, New Jersey, and a petition of 144 representative citizens of Gloucester, Salem, and Camden Counties, New Jersey, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., praying that liberal appropriations may be made for the construction of public works, and particularly for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN. I present the petition of John F. Stafford, praying for the purchase by Congress of a life-size portrait of General U. S. Grant. I presented a petition of a similar character in the early part of the session, but it has been lost, I understand, and this is simply a copy of the same petition, which I present that it may go to the committee in order to again call their attention to the subject. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Raleigh, N. C., praying that appropriations may be made for the construction of public works, and particularly for the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the New Garden monthly meeting of Friends, North Carolina, praying for the passage of Senate bill 355 to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COKE. I present the memorial of a large number of citizens of Robertson County, Texas, asking the enactment of a law requiring in all public schools in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the Military and Naval schools, and in the Indian and colored schools under Government control instruction in physiology and hygiene, which shall give special prominence to the nature of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics and of their effects upon the human system. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Ludington and Sheboygan, Mich., praying the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of H. C. Mudge and other ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Michigan, praying such pension legislation as is recommended by the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill, "to pay secretaries of legation for services rendered as chargés d'affaires ad interim during the two years ending June 30, 1880, $30,000." I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1785) changing the name of Sixteenth street, in Washington, D. C., to Executive avenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1786) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily B. Newell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 1787) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth M. Newman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1788) granting a pension to William S. More; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 1789) to facilitate the discharge of persons held for extradition where the President declines to surrender; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1790) for the relief of William R. Kilbourn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of William Tabb be withdrawn from the files, there having been no adverse report.

NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to the Senate:

I. A statement of the changes made from the original plans of the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin, in addition to those specified in a communication from the Navy Department to the House of Representatives of February 11, 1885 (constituting House Executive Document No. 230, Forty-eighth Congress, second session), together with the cost of such additional changes in each case, and also to furnish to the Senate copies of the records of the Navy Department, as follows:

II. Concerning the Dolphin: in addition to the papers accompanying the annual report of the Secretary of November 30, 1885, the letter of the Department of June 12, 1885, to the president of the examining board; the letter of the advisory board of July 13, 1885, accompanying their statement then made; a memorandum showing when the opinion of the Attorney-General was received by the Secretary, and by whom, when, and in what manner it was made public; any orders by the Department for the removal from the vessel of the spars, rigging, or other fittings and equipment, together with any revocation thereof; a complete copy of the agreement under which the ship was taken possession of by the Department, and all writings connected with the same, and also all correspondence, from and including the 20th of March, 1885, to the present time, upon the above subjects between the Department or any of its officers and the contractor or his assignees or the advisory and examining boards or any members thereof which are not contained in said annual report; also a statement as to the present condition of said ship, and whether or not she has been accepted by the Department.

III. Concerning the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta; the agreement under which the ships were taken possession of by the Department, and all writings connected with the same; and all correspondence since March 20, 1885, concerning these vessels, between the Department or any of its officers and the contractor or his assignees or the advisory board or any members of any board; and all reports of boards since said date, but not any lengthy schedules with such reports.

IV. Concerning the fracture of the shaft of the Dolphin; all reports of the advisory board; any papers or letters constituting the agreement for the substitution of iron instead of steel shafts in the four ships; and all correspondence on this subject between the Department or any of its officers and the contractor or the advisory board or any members thereof.

V. Concerning the payment of the reservations on the four ships; all applications by the contractor for such payment; the letters requesting the opinion of the Attorney-General and his opinion; any letters from the Department to the advisory board relative to verifying the correctness of the payments of installments previously made; all letters and vouchers making the payments of the reservations; all correspondence on this subject between the Department or any of its officers and the contractor or the advisory board or any members thereof; and any records showing that the contractor was in financial difficulty when the reservations were paid him.

VI. Concerning the payment of the reservations on the machinery of the Puritan; the contract for such machinery; all reports concerning the trials thereof; the letters and vouchers making the last payment and the payment of the reservations; and all correspondence on this subject between the Department or any of its officers and the contractor; together with any other records of the Department now existing which in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy will furnish useful information upon the foregoing six heads of inquiry; all copies furnished to be arranged under each head consecutively according to dates as nearly as may be practicable.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine morning business the Calendar is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the school bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business being the school bill.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me? There are two cases of unfinished business upon the Calendar which I think will go through without further debate.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for action on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No debate is in order upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Massachusetts quite frequently has a little unfinished business, I observe. Perhaps he will allow us first to get through with the regular unfinished business.

Mr. DAWES. And, if the Senator will indulge me, the Senator from Massachusetts has always kept his promise to withdraw it whenever it causes debate.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for action on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 6, after the word "Interior."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 6 as amended:

And that the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the proper administration of this law through the Commissioner of Education, and they are authorized and directed, under the approval of the President, to make all needful rules and regulations not inconsistent with its provisions to carry this law into effect.

Mr. BLAIR. There must be some mistake as to the number of the section to which the amendment is proposed to be added.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish it to come in at the end of section 6, as printed in the bill that I have before me. Perhaps there has been a reprint. It is the section which reads:

SEC. 6. That the money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BLAIR. That has been amended so as to read, "under the direction of the Legislature thereof." There is a reprint on the Senator's desk, he will see.

Mr. LOGAN. I had the wrong bill; but I do not see how that change has been made in the phraseology.

Mr. BLAIR. It was an amendment made by the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. In what part of the bill is the provision which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of this fund?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. That is section 4.

Mr. LOGAN. I have it now. My amendment would come in more properly, under the new print, at the end of section 4. I will offer it to that section; and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the object I have in view in offering the amendment.

The Secretary of the Interior being the responsible officer, made so by the bill, I desire to add the Commissioner of Education, so that through him the action of the Secretary of the Interior shall be brought to bear, and that the President be added, so that the three may make all needful rules and regulations not inconsistent with the law. That is the language of my amendment. For instance, in the distribution of the school-house or any fund, I propose that they may make some rule, not by which the States shall distribute the money, but by which it shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States, and upon which they themselves will examine into the question as to its proper distribution or use.

I will state to the Senate the object I have in view. As I said the other day, the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] particularly called my attention to it, and I have thought of it since. For instance, complaints may be made in some parts of the country in regard to the use of the money or its appropriation, and that would cause, as he stated and I think very properly, investigations to be made in reference to it. If there should be a rule agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Education, approved by the President, it would do away with that, because the reports would be made to them, and their statement and examination in reference to the matter would be satisfactory to the Congress of the United States and save a great deal of trouble.

I do not think the amendment interferes in the slightest degree with the idea that Senators have in reference to interfering with the power of the States in regulating their schools, but it is merely to make this a board instead of the Secretary of the Interior. That is my object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment be read again. I confess I do not understand its object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 4:

And that the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the proper administration of this law, through the Commissioner of Education, and they are authorized and directed, under the approval of the President, to make all needful rules and regulations not inconsistent with its provisions to carry this law into effect.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On page 8 of the reprint, section 11, line 37, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "then" the words "and not otherwise."

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It merely makes clear an implication that now exists under the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 11, line 37, after the word "then," the amendment is to insert the words "and not otherwise;" so as to read:

If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then, and not otherwise, the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to transpose section 14, which is the power to alter, amend, and repeal, to the end of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. That is correct. It should be done; and the numbering of the sections should be corrected accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be changed.

Mr. BLAIR. Section 13 has been misplaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to transpose section 14 to the end of the bill. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. The power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the clerks correct the numbering of the sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire, referring to section 12, whether he understands that the appeal to Congress by a State or Territory claiming this money against the opinion of the Interior suspends the effect of the act of the Secretary so that the money still goes, or whether the decision of the Secretary stands until Congress on appeal shall reverse it?

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose that this contemplates an adverse decision by the Secretary. Of course the money can not go contrary to the decision until it is overruled, and overruled by Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. What is meant by the phrase appealing to Congress? I understand that there would be the right to apply to Congress for relief under any circumstances. There can be no new definition of power in that paragraph.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be so; but it is there, and does no harm.

Mr. INGALLS. It might complicate the action of the Department or of the States by assuming that there was something different from the ordinary right of a State to appeal. I should like to know how a State or Territory could appeal to Congress from an apportionment made by the Secretary of the Interior. There is no proceeding analogous to an appeal from an inferior to a superior tribunal. There is nothing that ever I have heard of to which this could be compared. If it is merely the declaration of an abstract principle that there is a right of appeal to Congress of course it is unnecessary, because the right to appeal exists in any event; but how the action of the Secretary of the Interior could be changed or modified by an appeal to Congress I can not comprehend.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That had better be stricken out. It is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. INGALLS. I will move to strike out after the word "forfeiture," in line 6 of section 12, the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. BLAIR. I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that provision is very properly there and ought to be retained.

Mr. BLAIR. So it seems to me, but it does not do any harm to strike it out.

Mr. HOAR. The act without it would indicate that it was the contemplation of the bill that the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior was a finality, and if a State comes to Congress and says, "the Secretary has made a mistake which we want him to remedy," it might be met with the claim, "Congress has established a tribunal to settle these questions and decide everything on the States, and you are not properly here, undertaking to reverse what is in the nature of an award or a quasi-judicial proceeding." Therefore it seems to me very proper that in the case of so important an exercise of discretion as the withholding from a State of what might amount to millions of dollars as its share of this distribution, the bill itself should point out that a resort to Congress is contemplated if the State deems that it is aggrieved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8 of the reprinted bill, section 12, line 6, after the word "forfeiture," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "Congress," at the end of the section, as follows:

And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. It did not seem to me that the language was material; at the same time it is a suggestion, and as the Senator from Massachusetts says it can do no harm and may do good. I have no personal feeling about it as affecting the working of the bill; but as it is opposed, I prefer to stand by the bill as it is.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, there is a countervailing consideration in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts; and that is, if this reservation is retained in this particular instance there may be an argument that it has not been placed in the attitude of freedom on the part of Congress in regard to other matters. It is a very awkward expression to say that there is an appeal lying from a head of Department to the Congress of the United States, and my judgment was in favor of striking out that clause.

The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that it may seem that Congress has no control if an appeal is not reserved. I think it is an adequate countervailing suggestion that if other subjects are not reserved they are included in the same sense that this is a stipulated contract. I would not desire that there should be any such implication either by this remaining in or any other interpretation of the bill as leaving it in any other situation than a law of Congress which, like all other legislative powers of Congress, is always subject to the action of Congress.

As the Senator from New Hampshire does not regard the clause as very important to the bill, it seems to me that it is a blemish on the bill that it is here, and I desire that it may be struck out.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what has been said in the Senate accompanying the passage of the bill would probably have the same effect if an appeal became necessary to Congress whether this was in or out. It seems to be an absolutely extraneous matter, hardly worth discussing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I now offer the first amendment on the printed page which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator offers for adoption an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 11, line 12, after the word "also," it is proposed to insert:

A statement of the number of school districts in such State or Territory, and whether any portion of such State or Territory has not been divided into school districts or other territorial subdivisions for school purposes, and if so, what portion, and the reasons why the same has not been so subdivided; the number of children of school age in each district, and the relative number of white and colored children in each district.

Mr. CALL. Some of us have not heard the amendment which was announced recently as adopted. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] moved to strike out, in section 12, the words which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words stricken out, as follows:

And each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Merely the clause providing for an appeal to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], which will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. DOLPH's amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The object of this amendment is obvious. The bill as it stands requires the governor of each State and Territory to report—

The number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district.

It will be observed that this provision only relates to the number of schools, and from that report the number of school districts could not be ascertained, or whether schools had been maintained in all the school districts, or in what proportion of the school districts, or what the number of children of school age, white or black, was in each of the districts. Therefore it would be impossible for the Secretary of the Interior or any one else to determine from the report whether or not school facilities had been afforded to all the children of school age in the State or Territory. I do not see any objection that can be made to this amendment, as it is not inconsistent with what follows.

Mr. BLAIR. This only applies to the subsequent report after the act has gone into operation. There is no objection to the amendment, as all that information will be in the reports of the superintendents of public education in the various States, and so it may just as well be collected and furnished as any other table.

Mr. DOLPH. It is suggested that the word "and" should be inserted at the beginning of the amendment to make the connection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I move the adoption of the second amendment on the paper sent to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that in order to get the full information we ought to have we should know the number of these schools in each district; and therefore after the word "schools," in line 12, which is in perfect harmony with his amendment, I move to insert "in each district." With his permission I will move it now.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7 of the reprinted bill, at the end of line 12 of section 11, after the word "schools," it is proposed to insert the words "in each district;" so as to read:

And of the number of public, common, and industrial schools in each district,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I would like to suggest that after the word "employed," in line 13 of that section, it would be well to insert the words "rate of wages paid." It is nowhere provided that the rate of wages of teachers shall be given.

Mr. BLAIR. That can be furnished just as well. I do not object to the amendment. It is in the superintendents' reports.

Mr. DOLPH. I give way to that motion.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to insert after the word "employed," in line 13, the words "rate of wages paid;" so as to read:

The number of public, common, and industrial schools in each district, the number of teachers employed, the rate of wages paid, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I——

Mr. BLAIR. On the point suggested by the Senator from Kansas, the rate of wages paid, I have here the last report of the superintendent of public instruction of the State of North Carolina. It shows the number of public schools there for whites, 3,845; colored, 2,175; average time of school in days, 58; average monthly salary of white teachers, $24.16; average monthly pay of colored teachers, $22.06; showing that the matter is already collected and can be easily furnished.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I submit my amendment, and I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to this amendment and ask if it is at all in conflict with the amendment offered by the Senator a few days since and adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 11, lines 21 and 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed," and insert at the end of line 29, same section, the following:

And if any State or Territory shall have failed, except as permitted by section 8, to apply the money expended by it out of the amount apportioned to it under the provisions of this act, for any one year, to the support of common schools, free for all its children of school age, without distinction of color, and in such a way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of such State or Territory within such State or Territory, no subsequent allotment shall be made under this act until Congress shall so determine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that amendment in print?

Mr. DOLPH. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will raise an implication against the equality of the division among white and colored schools.

Mr. DOLPH. I thought it might. When this amendment was submitted and printed the amendment subsequently offered by the Senator from Vermont had not been adopted; and there are several provisions in the bill declaring that the money shall be used as contemplated by my amendment. I think those provisions in some sense are incompatible with the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont. It seems to me the bill ought to be changed in that respect, or else it is true that the amendment now offered by me is not in conflict with the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont; but if it is supposed it is in conflict with the amendment already adopted, I will not press its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much afraid it is. The amendment adopted on my motion in connection with the other parts of the bill would seem to me to require all that the Senator's amendment requires and more, by first requiring equal privileges in general as between child and child, and then, secondly, where separate establishments are kept up, that they shall be treated as establishments on equal terms. That is the way the bill stands now. So I think this is inconsistent.

Mr. DOLPH. It will be understood that the amendment proposed by me and printed was for the purpose of enforcing the declaratory portions of the bill, in which it is directed that this money shall be used for the equal benefit of all the children of school age, white or black; but if by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont there is to be an unequal distribution as between children of school age white and black in any of the States, then I think perhaps the amendment offered by me would be in conflict with it.

Therefore I withdraw the amendment and offer to insert, in line 20 of section 11 of the printed copy of the bill I have, after the word "purposes," the words "and in the manner;" so that the clause shall read:

And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used, other than for the purposes and in the manner herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that. That will do.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to it.

Mr. DOLPH. That will cover in part the object I have in view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], after the word "purposes," in line 20 of section 11, to insert "and in the manner."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from Oregon, to the shape in which he has left the intended provision for Alaska. It will be noticed that the amendment adopted on motion of the Senator from Oregon to section 2 is as follows:

That the District of Alaska shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act, &c.

The bill provides in section 3 that no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of the act until the governor shall file with the Secretary of the Interior certain statements. It is not possible for Alaska to file such a statement. In section 7 it is provided that no greater sum shall be apportioned to any State or Territory than the particular State or Territory expended out of its own revenues the preceding year for common-school purposes. Of course Alaska has expended none. It has no school revenue. So it seems to me unless the amendment is modified so as to take Alaska out from under those general provisions of the bill she would get absolutely and necessarily nothing under this amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not certain about that, but I will examine it, and if necessary submit an amendment. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if the substitute which I understand he proposes for the amendment offered by me yesterday in regard to basing this apportionment on the returns of the next census has been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. If not, I will offer it now, unless the Senator will do it as a substitute for the amendment I withdrew yesterday.

Mr. HALE. While the Senators are waiting to mature the amendment, I wish to move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is now pending.

Mr. HALE. In line 12, section 2 of the last print of the bill, I move to insert the word "illiterate," after the word "colored," between that and the word "children."

Mr. BLAIR. There is no means of ascertaining that; the census does not show that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 12, after the word "colored," insert "illiterate;" so as to read:

In the proportion that the white and colored illiterate children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years in such State or Territory bear to each other as shown by the last census.

Mr. INGALLS. Presumptively in the consideration of this bill all children between the ages of ten and twenty-one are illiterate. How would this affect the distribution?

Mr. HALE. I will state what my object is. If I do not reach it in this way I can in another way. I thought this the clearest and most distinct way of raising the issue which was first raised by the Allison amendment. There was considerable discussion in the body upon that amendment, and there was a disposition largely shown in favor of that amendment. Whether or not, had a test vote been taken upon it, it would have passed, I of course do not know; perhaps it would have been defeated; but certainly it raises a distinctive issue clearly enough to be entitled to a direct vote of this body. That has not been had because of the action taken the day before yesterday, when I will say I was not present, having been called over to the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol. It was first amended without any call for a division, I believe, and then, as amended, it was displaced by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. So the Senate has had no opportunity to vote upon the distinctive proposition submitted by the Senator from Iowa who is absent upon the public business of the country on the order of the Senate, and I desire now in some way, and I think I will devise some way, to bring the attention of the Senate to that distinctive proposition and ask for a vote upon it.

I use the word "illiterate" in moving this amendment because all through the bill illiteracy has been recognized as a distinctive condition. It has been adopted not only in the discussion but in the body of amendments and of the bill as meaning a particular thing, the inability, we will say, to write. That is my purpose in moving this amendment; but if it is better I will move instead to strike out from section 2, as it appears in this print, all after "1880," in line 7, down to and including the word "exist," in line 17, and to substitute for that the Allison amendment in terms.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to my friend what he has probably forgotten, that we are still in committee and it is not in order to amend what the Senate has put in; but the moment the bill is reported to the Senate the question will be on agreeing to this particular amendment, and then it will be open to amendment or we can reject it and insert the Allison amendment or any other.

Mr. HALE. I was under the impression that the bill had passed from the committee and that we were now considering it in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no. The question will arise when the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill is reported to the Senate the very question the Senator suggests will arise.

Mr. HALE. Then I shall have the opportunity to offer the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I was under the impression that the Senate was considering the bill as in the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I now move to insert, after "1880" in line 7 of section 2, the following words:

Until the illiteracy returns of the census of 1890 shall be received, and then upon the basis of that census.

So that the clause will read:

Such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880 until the illiteracy returns of the census of 1890 shall be received, and then upon the basis of that census.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I move an amendment to section 10, after the word "and," in line 4, where it reads "States and Territories," to insert "only for common or industrial schools in." That is to remove an inconsistency which exists on the face of the bill between section 6 as it now stands, which has reserved the right to establish industrial schools in the Territories, and section 10 as it now reads, which refers the whole application of the money only to common schools. The Senate will see immediately the effect of this change to read thus:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools not sectarian in character in the school districts of the several States, and only for common or industrial schools in Territories.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the amendment will be adopted. It removes an incongruity in the bill.

Mr. EVARTS. It is not a new proposition, but makes conformity between the two sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. I now offer an amendment by adding at the end of section 1 the following:

And if any State, by its Legislature, shall decline or relinquish its share or proportion under this act, or any portion thereof, the sum so relinquished shall go to increase the amount for distribution among the other States and the Territories as herein provided.

The proviso in section 1, as it now reads, is:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act; and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

That would leave it undetermined what would become of the fund that was thus not accepted, and I have only provided that in case a State should decide that it would not accept it, as has been suggested that some States might not, it would be proper to have it determined one way or the other whether this money thus relinquished should go back into the Treasury or whether it should increase the distribution among the other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall ask when this bill comes into the Senate that a separate vote be taken on the amendment which was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and also on the amendment offered by me. I think we should either treat all the States as entitled to the provisions of this act and pay all the money to them without requiring an act or joint resolution of their Legislative Assembly, or we should require a certain number of States to accept its provisions before we enter on the work of distributing this aid. If the amendment which I offered is not adopted I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado should be non-concurred in in the Senate. It is unjust to the State of Oregon, for instance. Suppose this bill should pass next February in the other House and then become a law, there will be no session of the Legislature of Oregon for two years, and two years would elapse before it would be possible for the State of Oregon to accept the provisions of this bill in the manner required unless the governor should take the responsibility of calling a special session of the Legislature for that purpose.

I do not think the Senate considered the propriety of some rule upon this subject if this provision is to remain. Nor am I in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. It would be a sort of compulsion upon the States. The citizens of the State would gain nothing by rejecting the money offered under this bill. Instead of it going into the Treasury and lessening the tax on their citizens to supply this fund, it would simply go to the States who accepted the provisions of the bill.

As I say, I shall ask a separate vote both on the amendment offered by me and the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. If some provision is not made as to when the bill is to go into effect, or what number of States shall accept it before we commence the distribution, then I think we should see what States accept it and make the distribution at once; otherwise we throw the whole matter into confusion, and it will be impossible for any Secretary of the Interior or any other executive officer to execute the bill, some States accepting its provisions two years after other States are receiving their proportion.

If a State does not accept the provisions of this bill I think the money should go back into the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the amendment will be adopted. There is no possible view in which it can do any harm. There has been a carefully cultivated sentiment spread abroad throughout the Northern country that they do not want this money, that it is in some sense dishonorable and humiliating in the great Northern States to receive it, and that they will resent the taking of it. This amendment places them in a most kindly and liberal disposition in regard to the rejection of that which would otherwise go to them, and makes over that which they do not find necessary for themselves in their abundance and intelligence to the more needy portions of the country where the money is wanted; and the whole $77,000,000, as the Senator from Illinois showed us yesterday, would be but a very trifling amount in comparison with the actual want. It does seem to me as though no friend of the bill ought to be opposed to this amendment, but should rather anxiously seek for the adoption of the amendment, and certainly no one opposed to the bill on the grounds which have been stated on this floor can have the slightest objection to its adoption.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I am unable to understand how this amendment that I have proposed should become entangled with the propositions heretofore made by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Colorado and the results of the votes of the Senate on those subjects. This is applied to the simplest matter in the world. There is a clause in the bill that no money is to be paid to any State until that State by its Legislature shall have accepted its provisions. That is indeterminate entirely. What shall become of the money not accepted? I desire to put at least an end to the doubt in respect to a final and peremptory action of any State which may decline to receive or may relinquish this proffer.

The question would then be whether that money should lapse into the Treasury, or whether the fund going to the other States should be thereby increased. I am not able to understand any very good reason why a State should decline this amount on the mere interest of saving its share to be used in diminishing the taxation of the whole United States of America to that extent; but I can very well understand how one of the strong and Northern States, if it should be indisposed to allow its school system to be at all affected by the benefits of this bill, might very well feel that it was not injuring the rights and interests of the other portions of the country that might need more than they received of benefit, and indeed would aid the proposition that this was to go to illiteracy where it was more needed than it was in the strong and educated States. I hope the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is eminently unjust. A State in the exercise of her own judgment, of her own sound discretion, arrives at the conclusion that her system of education without any outside interference or aid can be successfully carried on. That is the opinion of that State, and she concludes that she can not afford to appear in the character of a mendicant or an applicant for charities from other States who are in no respect in better condition than that State. That State refuses to receive its share of the school money offered by Congress. What is the effect of the amendment of the Senator from New York? It is the injection of a penal statute into a bill said to be in aid of education; it is saying to a State, "If you dare to exercise your judgment in doing what you deem to be right for the common schools in your State and decline to take this money, it shall be taken and passed over to some other State which thinks differently, and your people shall be taxed all the same as if you received the money."

Is there any fairness on this earth in that proposition? If, for instance, the State of Texas believes that she can conduct her own school system, and she does it—and I know that to be the fact that she can conduct her own school system after her own fashion, and has abundant ability and the will to educate both races, colored and white, and needs no assistance from anybody to carry that out—and therefore prefers that that share of the money which under this bill would go in aid of the schools of the State of Texas shall remain in the Treasury, has she not that right? And yet if the State comes to that conclusion, to exercise her right, her people are not to be benefited by that conclusion, but her people are to be taxed to raise the amount of money which she would have received and which goes to another State; and thus this amendment is a penal statute injected into this bill. In every sense of the word it seems to me to be unjust.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. MAXEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I regard this amendment as in the nature of a residuary clause in a last will and testament. We are simply disposing of the whole estate, and if there is a lapsed legacy it goes to somebody else. It is an assignment of all the assets of the Government, and we may as well give it to the beneficiaries. If there is a lapsed legacy in this bequest let it go to the other legatees.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not believe there is a Northern State that will relinquish its rights under this bill if it ever becomes a law. I do not know any sentiment among the Northern people that will prevent their taking all the money they can get honestly for their common schools. This amendment is offered merely as a tribute to a sentiment that does not exist.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). Although I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], there is an agreement between us as to amendments under which I am at liberty to vote in this case; I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is absent by direction of the Senate on committee service, and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Upon all questions connected with the consideration of this bill I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is still confined at his home by illness, and is not able to be present in the Senate Chamber. He is paired on this bill.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Blair,	Evarts,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Bowen,	George,	Palmer,	Teller,
Brown,	Gibson,	Payne,	Vance,
Call,	Hoar,	Pugh,	Walthall.
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Eustis,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,

NAYS—23.

Blackburn,	Frye,	Logan,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Coke,	Hale,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Harris,	McMillan,	Wilson of Iowa,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—28.

Aldrich,	Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Morrill,
Allison,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Beck,	Fair,	Mahone,	Platt,
Berry,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Butler,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Vest,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Voorhees.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to give notice that when the bill passes into the Senate I shall ask a separate vote upon the amendment just adopted on the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment to section 11. I move to strike out all after the word "provided," where the same occurs in line 39, as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to promptly investigate all complaints lodged with him of any misappropriation by or in any State or Territory of any moneys received by such State or Territory under the provisions of this act, or of any discrimination in the use of such funds; and the said complaints, and all communications received concerning the same, and the evidence taken upon such investigations, shall be preserved by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be open to public inspection and annually reported to Congress.

I hope, Mr. President, that this amendment will commend itself to the favorable judgment of the Senate. The language of the section, if I may be permitted to repeat it, which I propose to strike out, is:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

Every lawyer knows that language permissive in form is frequently held by the courts to be mandatory. Thus the word "may," where the interests of third parties or of the public are involved, is generally construed to be equivalent to the word "shall." There are cases in which words granting power to a judicial or other officer to discharge a given function have been held to be mandatory; but it is quite clear upon the authorities, as I remember them, that the language which it is proposed to strike out would be construed as merely permissive.

One element of weakness in this bill, among those who have felt disposed to favor it on general principles, is the want of security against any misappropriation of this fund by or in the States or Territories among which it is to be distributed. This amendment is designed to remedy that difficulty in a measure, and it can only be remedied in a measure, for it is to some extent inherent. As the bill stands, the only information which Congress is to obtain as to the application of this money made by the States and Territories is derived from reports made by certain State and Territorial officers.

If this amendment is adopted it will constitute, I think, a proclamation in the law to every one in the States which receive a portion of this money that it is a popular fund in which they have an interest and as to which they may make, without difficulty, complaints, if they deem it necessary. I desire by this amendment to give it into the power of every man, woman, or child, North or South, black or white, who conceives that there is any misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of this money to lodge a complaint with the Secretary of the Interior, and to make it without possibility of question the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to investigate that complaint; to preserve the complaint itself and all communications concerning it, and all testimony taken upon the subject, as public records, open to the inspection of all the people, and to report that information annually to Congress, in order that we may see what complaints are made and what testimony is taken; and I think in this way we may more efficiently ascertain whether or not the States and Territories are using this fund in accordance with the letter and spirit of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer an amendment to the amendment adopted yesterday in regard to Alaska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3 of the reprinted bill, section 2, line 19, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert:

But no acceptance of the provisions of this act, report of the governor of the District, or expenditure by the district for school purposes shall be required.

Mr. DOLPH. That is to cover the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana that certain provisions of the bill could not be complied with by the District of Alaska. It is merely to except the District of Alaska from compliance with those conditions. I have shown the amendment to the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, and he has no objection to it. I have shown it to the Senator from Indiana, and it covers the point made by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I observe that the District of Columbia is omitted from the beneficial provisions of this bill. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether the omission was intentional, and, if so, why?

Mr. BLAIR. It was struck out of the orginal bill by the action of the Senate in the last Congress. It was in the original bill, and I should be very glad to see the District inserted, as its people appear to be the only portion of the American people who are left out.

Mr. INGALLS. There are especial reasons why the provisions of the bill should apply to the District of Columbia, as the Senator knows, the number of colored children here being exceptionally large. I will therefore move to insert on page 3, in line 18 of section 2, after the word "that," the words "the District of Columbia and," so as to read:

Provided, That the District of Columbia and the District of Alaska shall be considered Territories, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the whole be read now with the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The reason I proceed no further is that if the amendment should be agreed to the paragraph will require further amendments grammatically.

Mr. BLAIR. Senators may not have observed the adoption of the amendment last offered by the Senator from Oregon in reference to reports, &c., which I can not exactly understand unless it is read in connection with the section; but I agree to the first suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, the insertion of the District of Columbia at the commencement of the provision touching the District of Alaska.

Mr. INGALLS. Then may we have a vote on that proposition, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, section 2, line 18, after the first word "that," it is moved to insert:

The District of Columbia and.

And at the end of the line to strike out the word "a" and to change the word "Territory" to the word "Territories"——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Chief Clerk suspend one moment? Upon further examination of the bill I am convinced that the purpose of this amendment would be better promoted by inserting the words "and the District of Columbia" after the word "Territories" in the second line of section 2 so as to read:

That such moneys shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLAIR. That would be much better.

Mr. INGALLS. I therefore change my motion, and move to insert the words in section 2, line 2, after the word "Territories."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of section 2, after the word "Territories," it is proposed to insert the words "and in the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories and in the District of Columbia in that proportion, &c.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas whether it would not be necessary to modify somewhat in the interest of the District, as was done in the interest of Alaska, some of the other provisions of the bill, as for instance section 3?

Mr. BLAIR. That will have to follow through all the sections of the bill, I suppose.

Mr. INGALLS. It will require a critical examination of the bill if this is adopted in order to make the other provisions operative, but it will be a matter of very small difficulty to accomplish that result.

Mr. BLAIR. Will it not answer all the purposes of the Senator from Kansas to provide in a separate section that the District of Columbia shall be taken to be a Territory under the provisions of this act? That is not exactly the proper form, but had it not better be in a separate section, so as to save the trouble of inserting the words "District of Columbia" wherever the words "States and Territories" occur?

Mr. INGALLS. Even if the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire should be concurred in, it will still be advantageous to have the words inserted in the second line of section 2, and the other sections can be provided for later.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not think that will do any harm in the first part of section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. BLAIR. There is this to be considered, that all the provisions that grow out of the race question exist here in this District, and it seems to me that a separate section providing that the District be treated as a Territory would carry out the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That might not do, because in some of the amendments it is provided that the Legislatures of the Territories shall act like the Legislatures of States in regard to their laws about schools, and there is not any local legislature here. It can all be accomplished by agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as it is now offered, and then a short section of three lines saying that the District of Columbia shall be entitled to all the benefits and subject to all the regulations of the act, so far as applicable. That will do it all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, I move to insert an additional section, to be placed the last but one in the bill, in the following words:

That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to all the benefits and subject to all the regulations of this act, so far as applicable under its form of government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of section 2:

Provided, also, That the Indian Territory shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act, and the money apportioned to said Territory shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein. The provisions of sections 3 and 7 of this act shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

Mr. President, the other day when I attempted to call attention to the Indian tribes, the objection made, which I admitted had considerable force, was the difficulty of carrying out the idea that prevails in this bill so as to be applicable to the Indian Territory. We have now added Alaska to the bill, and provided that the bill shall be applicable to that Territory. There can be no practical difficulty under this amendment in including the Indian Territory, which contains, according to the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, 65,000 Indians of full blood residents in that section of country. I find the agents also report the number of railroad employés and other people living in the Territory by permission of the tribes, including those to whom they have granted lands, as about one-half of the Indian population, or something over 30,000; they are put at about 35,000. I read from one of the agent's reports:

The number of whites within this agency who are laborers for Indians, employés of railroad companies, licensed traders, pleasure-seekers, travelers, and intruders, must be about 35,000, or half the number of Indians.

It does seem to me that when we are making a general provision we ought to include that class of people in the Indian Territory as well as any other. I will call attention to the report next to the last report of the United States Indian agent at the Union agency in the Indian Territory. I desire to read a brief extract. Speaking of the five civilized tribes he says:

Each of these nations has a public-school system similar to those of the States, and holds teachers' institutes at its capital annually. The settlements are so far apart that schools can be established only at neighborhoods where ten or more scholars can be got together. The neighborhood builds the house and the nation furnishes teachers and books. Most of the teachers are educated Indians who teach the English only in their schools. In addition to the neighborhood schools each nation has academies and seminaries, boarding schools for their children only. The Cherokees have two fine seminaries that have been in successful operation for many years. They are managed and operated by Cherokees. The Choctaws have three large academies, one under the management of the Methodist Church South, and the other two by the Presbyterian missionary board. The Chickasaws have four academies, conducted by contractors who are citizens of the Chickasaw Nation. The Seminoles have two, one under the management of the Methodist Church South, the other by the Presbyterian missionary board, the nation paying the managers about $80 per annum for each pupil boarded, clothed, and educated. The Creeks have four seminaries, under the management of the following religious societies: The Methodist Church South, Southern Baptist, Presbyterian, and Baptist home missionary societies, the latter for Creek freedmen.

In addition to the above there are subscription schools. These are schools established by private enterprise and students paying tuition, except in cases where individuals or societies in the State pay tuition for certain students. These schools receive no support from the nations. Worcester Academy, at Vinita, under the supervision of the Congregational Society, erected two years ago by funds subscribed by citizens of the Cherokee Nation, is one of the best in the Territory, and has an average of about 100 students. Harrell Institute, at Muskogee, managed by the Methodist Church South, has about 140 students, and has in progress of erection a fine academy building. Indian University, at Tahlequah, managed by the Baptist Home Missionary Society, is a flourishing school. It will be removed to Muskogee as soon as buildings now in course of erection are completed. The schools managed by religious societies, either as pay schools or under contract with the nations, are generally the most successful.

In addition to the white people who go into the Indian Territory, and who, if educated at all, must be educated in these Indian schools, there is a large number, as everybody understands, of freedmen, not less than two or three thousand freedmen, or colored people, within the bounds of the Indian Territory. If the purpose is to provide for all classes of people who are so unfortunate as not to have had all the opportunities of education, there can be no reason why the Indian Territory should not be included. If it is said by anybody that they have abundant means and are able to educate their own children, that may be said of the States which are to receive the benefit of this bill. I heard Senator after Senator here say that his State demanded nothing and required nothing. I said early in the debate that the State which I in part represent did not need it, did not want it, would accept it, of course, but that my course on the bill would not be influenced in the slightest degree whether the State of Colorado received a portion of this money or not. So it is not because all the beneficiaries are unable to support schools, but it is because, when we adopt the system, we have supposed it should include all the people. Why should it not include the Indians of the Indian Territory? Under this amendment there will be no practical difficulty whatever in carrying out the provision. I want the Senate to pass upon this question whether, when we are providing for every portion of the country, we are willing to exclude from the beneficent purposes and objects of this bill the Indian Territory, where they need the aid quite as much as in any other portion of the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator's amendment provide for ascertaining the number of illiterates, so as to make the distribution on the basis of illiteracy?

Mr. TELLER. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that in such manner as he sees fit.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANCE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following additional proviso:

Provided, also, That the Indian Territory shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act, and the money apportioned to said Territory shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein. The provisions of sections 3 and 7 of this act shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will observe that according to the phraseology of his amendment it applies not only to what are called the five tribes, about whom the Senator has read the condition, which I think is very accurate, but it also applies to about as many more Indians who may be termed wild or blanket Indians, who have no other system of education than that furnished by the United States in the appropriation acts from time to time, and have no such system, no such regulations, no such means by which illiteracy can be ascertained as are applicable to the five tribes.

It is pretty difficult to determine whether an appropriation for the benefit of the five tribes in the Indian Territory would be beneficial. One beneficial effect of it I can see, which would be incidental and outside of the question of education. It would have a tendency to bring them nearer to the United States, and make their connection with the United States closer and more familiar. Everything which tends to that, beyond the beneficial effects in the line of education, would be of great advantage. One great difficulty now is that everything that transpires between the United States and them has the opposite effect, and this would have that beneficial effect, if no other.

It is due, however, to say that the condition of education in the five tribes does not result from any lack of means on their part. There is a need of inspiration, there is a need of something that simply a donation of money will not give to those five tribes. They have an abundance of money to support their schools; they do send into the States to be educated every year thirty or forty scholars; they maintain in each of those five tribes two or three of what are called high schools, abundantly supplied so far as money is concerned; and the laws in regard to school attendance, of some of the five tribes at least, are compulsory. Between the ages of five and fifteen every Indian child is, according to law, required to attend a school taught in the English language.

Yet there is something wanting which this money will not give; but so far as the amendment is applicable to the five tribes, if the Senator will confine it to them, I shall vote for his amendment myself, because it will be worth more than all the money to get their faces turned toward the United States, and to get them into co-operating with the United States in all matters that pertain to their welfare. I do not see how it can be applied to the other tribes.

A dollar expended in the education of the Indians is not misspent. I do not care where it comes from, if it can be expended with a fair result and in a manner that will pay back in result a dollar's worth of some kind of education to the Indians. I do not care much about book education for the Indian in these days; but something that will teach him the difference between savage and civilized life is what he is hungering and thirsting for, and not intricate principles of philosophy, moral, intellectual, or any other kind, such as I saw taught. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and myself heard lessons recited by Indian girls to an Indian teacher, in one of those high schools, in moral philosophy, using the same book that is taught at the colleges here at the North. Yet there is a lack of the knowledge of what makes the difference between a growing and a developing individual life among those Indians, a lack of that which I should like to see them inspired with. I do not see that it is to come by donating to the five tribes an addition of money when what they need they do not feel that they want; and what they do not need is an additional sum of money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the amendment ought not to be adopted. It is entirely out of proportion with the avowed objects and purposes of the bill, which is based upon a danger that threatens our institutions in consequence of a great mass of unlettered and ignorant holders of the suffrage. The people in the Indian Territory have nothing to do with our suffrage; they are not voters; they contribute nothing whatever, as the citizens of the States do, to the resources of the country from which this money is to be paid.

While I am in favor of the widest and most liberal appropriations for Indian education, this is not the place to do it. We provide for them by special appropriations in the Indian appropriation bill year by year. We establish Indian schools, not in the Indian Territory but in the States, and I will vote for whatever may be necessary to educate the entire Indian population of this country; but they do not belong in this bill, and it is out of proportion and inharmonious with the objects and purposes of it.

Aside from that, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, it is impossible to apply the provisions of this bill outside the limits of what are known as the five civilized nations. The idea of attempting to distribute this money among the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Comanches, and all the other vagrant and wandering and nomadic and predatory tribes that roam over those great regions west of the civilized nations, to anybody who is familiar with their condition is picturesque, to say the least; I shall not characterize it by an offensive epithet, but it is certainly picturesque.

With regard to the five civilized nations, their educational system is on a very satisfactory basis. The Cherokees and the Choctaws pay out of their own resources for the education of their own illiterates a larger proportion of their property, a larger per cent. of their own income, and a greater per cent. per capita than is paid either in Kansas, in Colorado, or in Massachusetts. The Senator from Colorado shakes his head, by that I suppose meaning to express his dissent; but in company with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. DAWES] I visited that region last summer, and we investigated minutely and in detail into the condition of those people. Not only do they not need anything that they would receive under this distribution, but it would be an interference with an enlightened, broad, comprehensive, and efficient system under which the most satisfactory results have been reached.

There we find a nation that absolutely pays no taxes whatever for the support of its own institutions, a nation where there is not a pauper, old or young, male or female, a nation where every family has a fixed local habitation and an abundant support, and after which the institutions of civilization might in many ways appropriately take pattern.

I therefore suggest to the Senator from Colorado that sharing as I do with him in sympathy, and design, and purpose for the elevation of the Indians by education, they have no part nor lot in the fund that is provided in this bill. I shall vote to give them more than their proportion in any bill that may be brought up for that purpose.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I apprehend that the Senator from Kansas is a little mistaken in the scope of this provision, because it will be left, as I understand it, discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior to expend this money entirely for the maintenance of industrial schools, if in his judgment it is fit that it should be so done.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in the bill.

Mr. CHACE. That is clearly the provision of the bill, as the Senator from New Hampshire says. Further, it seems to me that the Senator from Kansas misapprehends the spirit of this bill, the object that is sought to be attained. It is based not altogether upon the idea that it is dangerous to the welfare of the country to have a large voting population who are illiterate, but upon the doctrine that a large body of illiterates are dangerous themselves, whether voters or not; that ignorance is a danger to our institutions, a threat to our institutions, and to their stability.

It seems to me also that the Senator is somewhat in conflict with himself, because in the forepart of his remarks he pictured to us these Indians as in a continued nomadic state, having made comparatively little if any progress, leaving us to infer that the hope of education to the Indian was entirely out of our reach; and then he tells us that the civilized tribes have made a large advance and that they are maintaining schools. In fact the whole base and groundwork of his argument is that we have denied to those people the inherent right of suffrage; that we have treated them, while they are here of their own right, as aliens; in other words, because we have done them a wrong through all these years, because we have kept them in a false position, debarred them from attaining the rights of citizenship, we will now continue to add to that wrong by refusing to furnish them the aid which we are proffering to the States and to other Territories, to build them up and prepare them for the rights of citizenship, the only condition which will ever relieve us of this great problem!

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am aware that the Indian question is a burning issue in Rhode Island and other portions near the seaboard, but I certainly should not be blamed for the want of capacity which the Senator from Rhode Island exhibits to understand my position.

I said nothing whatever about a denial of the rights of education to the Indians. I said nothing whatever about the incapacity of the Indians to be elevated. I said, on the contrary, that many of them had been greatly elevated. I avowed my desire, and my purpose, and my wish, and my intention, to vote for the most liberal appropriations for the education of the Indians. And for the Senator to rise within three minutes after I had made those statements and say that I was in conflict with myself evinces either a disposition to misrepresent or a want of capacity to apprehend.

I made no comparison between the Indians who were roving west of 96° and those who were permanently settled east of that line. That had no part or lot in the statement that I made. My statement was historical, and if the Senator is aware at all of the condition of affairs there he must know that my statement was correct. In saying that there were to the westward nomadic and wandering and vagrant Indians, I did not say that they were incapable of elevation, and in saying that the people to the east of that line had made great advances, I certainly was not endeavoring in any way whatever to cast a stigma upon the Indian character.

I trust, therefore, that the Senator will allow me to be my own interpreter, and not place upon my language a construction that is derived from his own ideas of the Indian question or the relations of Congress to the subject of Indian education.

Mr. TELLER. The difficulty anticipated by the Senator from Kansas in reference to the tribes known as the uncivilized tribes is purely imaginary. The whole matter is left with the Secretary of the Interior, who is the absolute disposer of all the money that is voted by Congress for Indian education. He places it wherever he sees fit in most cases. Of course there are some specific appropriations, but there is a large amount of money which is placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior; and he selects the place to put the money. All he has to do when this money comes into his hands is to determine where he will put it, whether he will give it to Cheyennes or Arapahoes in the West, or whether he will give it to the more quiet and peaceable Nez Percés, or whether he will give it to some other of the semi-civilized Indians in that Territory.

The honorable Senator from Kansas states that the civilized tribes have made such a magnificent provision for the education of their children that they are all brought within the opportunities at least of an education.

Such is not exactly the fact. I know the Senator is familiar with the country, that it lies on the borders of his State; I know that he has a pretty thorough acquaintance with it; but yet if he will examine the records he will find that that is not exactly true; that he is mistaken when he says that the opportunities of education are presented to the Indians. Only two years ago a benevolent woman came here to the Senate for an appropriation for the Creeks. It was said by the Appropriations Committee that the Creeks were able to take care of their own children, and undoubtedly that was true. Yet they did not do so, and this woman went into the New England or Eastern States and gathered money to build a school-house—$15,000 for one place and I think about $3,000 for another, and she is maintaining those two schools to-day by charitable contributions from the people of New York and New England and other sections of the country where she is acquainted.

I know that very likely it would be very much a waste of money as applied to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. I know something about them; I think I know as much about the Cheyennes and the Arapahoes as the Senator from Kansas or anybody else here. They were my neighbors twenty-five years ago. They were not always desirable neighbors, either. I saw them everywhere, in the towns and out of the towns, and when they came to Washington after I was Secretary of the Interior I recognized some of them as men I had seen in their wild, warlike attitude on the plains, and I recollected the time when I had been exceedingly anxious that they should not see me. I know they have not made much progress, and it is doubtful whether they will for some years yet; but there are within the boundaries of that Territory Indians who are making an effort themselves. I called attention the other day to the fact that the Osages had provided that the interest of the moneys held in trust by the Government of the United States for their use should be withheld from every family that declined or neglected to send their children to school for a certain number of months in the year, and I suppose they have abundance of money; but the Nez Percés, of whom I need not speak now, having done so very frequently on this floor, a people who were put there against their will, have not the advantage of schools that they ought to have, and never have had it since they have been there.

There will be no difficulty whatever in the Secretary of the Interior distributing this money; and if those Indians are not voters now, if this great danger of an uneducated voter does not stare us in the face to-day it will stare us in the face very soon, for nobody will suppose that we can keep two hundred and sixty odd thousand Indians in this country out of the citizenship that they will ultimately demand and that the country will give them. A people who could take four million uneducated and ignorant Africans and thrust them at one movement into the body politic, creating citizens of them, and giving them the power in communities where they lived without education, and actually controlling the entire interests of communities, ought not to be alarmed at a few uneducated Indians. But it is wisdom to commence now the education of those Indians and not wait until they are about to be made citizens of the United States.

There is not any reason that can be given why the bill should not apply to the Indians in the Indian Territory as much as it applies to the Indians in Alaska or to the colored men or the white men in any other portion of the country who are needing the benefit of assistance from the General Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following additional proviso:

Provided, also, That the Indian Territory shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act, and the money apportioned to said Territory shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein. The provisions of sections 3 and 7 of this act shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Colorado tell me precisely what he means by "the Indian Territory." Does he mean the country of the Five Nations?

Mr. TELLER. I mean what is always known in common parlance as the Territory lying south of Kansas, set apart for the Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where the Five Nations are?

Mr. TELLER. Where the Five Nations are; and there are other Indians also there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know; but that Territory?

Mr. TELLER. That is what I mean.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what the Senator understands to be technically the legal name?

Mr. TELLER. That is technically "the Indian Territory."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not cover the roaming Indians in other parts of the United States?

Mr. TELLER. It does not cover roaming Indians at all.

Mr. DAWES. In other words, all Indian tribes outside of the five tribes in that Territory, which are just about as much, according to number, as the five tribes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was trying to get at the geographical place. Whether that is a correct definition, I am not quite sure.

Mr. DAWES. It is known in law as "the Indian country." That was the definition originally given to it, and it has come down as "the Indian country" to the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was my understanding; but the amendment uses the word "Territory," which led me to not quite understand what was meant.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator that in all the dealings of the Department it is always referred to as "the Indian Territory." The Supreme Court of the United States decided a good many years ago that "the Indian country" meant any Indian reservation. Therefore I did not care about using that phrase, because it would bring up the very question that the Senate decided they would not go into, that is, applying the bill to the people outside of organized communities. These are organized Indian communities, with the exception of the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Comanches; perhaps there would be no great danger in leaving this money to the most of them, but the Secretary of the Interior under my amendment will have the absolute control, and he can put it all with one tribe or he can put it all with another, as I understand, as he thinks they ought to have it.

Mr. DAWES. In common language everybody understands what is meant by "the Indian Territory;" but the attempt to apply the term

"Indian country" to all Indian lands did not meet the sanction of the Supreme Court. When it was brought before the circuit court presided over in one of the western districts by a gentleman who was formerly Secretary of War, on the indictment of a man described as committing an offense in the Indian country, he was discharged because in the opinion of the court the term "Indian country" had a technical meaning applicable only to that which we call "the Indian Territory." But in such a statute as this, I have no doubt that the term "Indian Territory" will be sufficiently definite.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Understanding that the term "Indian Territory" is intended to apply to that tract of country where the five civilized nations reside, and other tribes as well who are not civilized, and understanding it to apply also to the members of the five civilized tribes as well as the others, I have one difficulty, although I entirely sympathize with the object the Senator from Colorado has in view. By treaties of the United States with the five civilized nations, the Five Nations, as they are called, it is solemnly agreed that they shall have their own institutions and their own government, of themselves, and by themselves, and for themselves; and under those treaties they have established constitutions and made laws, and have legislatures, by whatever name they call them, and courts of justice, and schools, and everything that belongs to the autonomy of a civilized community.

That being so, to say that those people shall have this money to be expended in that Territory in respect of educating their children under the sole direction of the Secretary of the Interior is putting the children of the five civilized nations, who have governments of their own by our solemn agreement that we will not interfere with, in the same attitude exactly as the wild Indians of Alaska or the wild tribes that have been located within the region of country where the five civilized nations are. It does not appear to me that that would be right; but as it regards the five civilized nations, as they are called the Five Nations, if we are to give them the money at all (which I am quite willing to do if we can arrange the proper phraseology), they ought to stand upon exactly the same basis as a State. Let them accept it, let them be bound to distribute it accordingly, without respect to race or color, and have fair play in educating their children; but we ought not to invade, against the agreements of our treaties, their own autonomy of their own school system and say that their children shall only get the benefit of this money in such a way and under such regulations and arrangements as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, because it does not put them on the footing that they are entitled to be put on, if we are to give any aid at all, by our solemn treaties and obligations with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to make one observation with reference to this matter, which it seems to me would remove the objection of the Senator from Vermont. Whatever goes to the Indian country or Territory is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and by the provisions of the bill in any Territory (and this is to be considered as a Territory) the money may be expended for common or industrial schools. If the civilized tribes which have been mentioned can not properly receive their proportion, if there is any objection whatever in any way, as undoubtedly there must be from the suggestions made by the Senator, then it will be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to spend it outside of those tribes, among the remaining tribes of wild Indians, and to establish either common schools or industrial schools, one or both, as the case may be; and the whole of it may undoubtedly be expended for industrial schools.

Mr. TELLER. To obviate the objection made by the Senator from Vermont, if I may be allowed to amend my amendment, I will add the following:

No money shall be expended among the civilized tribes except by and with the consent of said tribe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not meet the point.

Mr. TELLER. Why not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Five Nations are to have this money at all, as I am quite willing that they should in their proper proportion, they ought to be put on exactly the same footing as a State; that is to say, as they have a perfect autonomy about everything, just as perfect as the State of Ohio, or Colorado, or Vermont, their own authorities should be put on the same footing as those States, and their council, or legislature, or whatever it is called, should agree to accept this donation, subject to the provisions of the bill; and then their own schools should be aided not in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, but according to the provisions of the law.

Mr. TELLER. Do you offer such an amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I had a minute to do it in I might.

Mr. TELLER. I will withdraw mine and let the Senator from Vermont offer an amendment such as he suggests.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not undertake to do it in a moment, for I do not understand exactly what the Senator wants to accomplish.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think there need be any difficulty practically in this matter. The provision that the Senator from Vermont mentions was of course inserted for the benefit of the Indians, and I do not suppose if the money was apportioned to them that the Secretary of the Interior would think of creating separate and independent schools—that was not my idea—but that he might distribute it as he thought they were entitled to it under the law. I think that there is no practical difficulty; but the amendment may be so modified as to obviate the objection made by the Senator from Vermont.

I think there is a little more in this than a matter of the money that those people are to get. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts that the legislation which recognizes these people as having a connection with us and an interest with us and that we have an interest in them, will be of great advantage to them. As I said a moment ago, the day is not far distant when they must become members of the body-politic. Just what will be done, whether we shall erect a State out there and give them all the rights of Statehood, I do not know; but something must be done. The anomalous condition in which they are living can not be maintained much longer, and everybody understands it. I have my own theory as to what ought to be done; but what will strike the public mind and the legislative department of the Government when they come to act upon it as the proper thing, of course I do not know and can not say. But I am exceedingly anxious that those people should see that when we are providing a general system for the education of the people of the United States, we do not stand them off as having no part or lot with the people of the United States. There are 35,000 white people, as I said before, living inside of that Territory to-day, as shown by the report of 1884. They are citizens of the United States; their children are entitled to be educated, and when their children leave the Indian borders they will become voters. If it is dangerous to have an illiterate voter in Mississippi, in Georgia, or in Alabama, it will be just as dangerous to have that illiterate when he goes over into Illinois or any of the other States and becomes a voter there as if he were a citizen of the United States now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONGER. If the proposition on which we are voting is proposed to be amended I would rather vote on the amendment first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no amendment pending except the proposition of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the Senator from Vermont was to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that an amendment was being prepared.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed the Senator from Vermont was preparing one that would suit him better and accomplish just what I have indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would not delay the Senate to do it now.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think there need be any great haste about the matter. I will withdraw my amendment for the present and offer it again in the Senate, so that an amendment can be framed which will meet the approbation of the Senator from Vermont and others who now criticise mine in its present form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be withdrawn if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he would object to inserting after the word "children," in line 14 of section 11, the words "in the State or Territory, and the total number," requiring the report to contain not only the number of those taught but the total number in the Territory or State, so that we may know the proportion between those who attend school and those who do not? That is not elsewhere provided.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that is provided for in some of the other sections.

Mr. INGALLS. Not in this connection.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to such an amendment, however.

Mr. INGALLS. I move then after the word "children," in line 14 of section 11, to insert the words "in the State or Territory, and the total number;" so as to read:

The number of public, common, and industrial schools in each district, the number of teachers employed, the rate of wages paid, the total number of children in the State or Territory, and the total number taught during the year, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the bill in section 5 by adding after "United States," in line 4, the words:

And instruction in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the nature of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics, and of their effect upon the human system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. That amendment I presume the Senator from New Hampshire will not object to. While of course I know that his acceptance will not necessarily secure its adoption, at the same time it will be a long step in that direction. It is a proposition to which I think the Committee on Education and Labor of which he is a member has already agreed; and certainly if this is a good thing at retail it ought to be a good deal better at wholesale. In the present temper of the public mind in regard to this great question I think that such a provision would not only meet with the greatest popular approval, but would be an important step in the direction of a general dissemination of that information which is now much called for, and which undoubtedly will be called for much more in the future.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be very glad indeed if the amendment could be adopted without prospective injury to the final vote on the bill. A bill has been reported to the Senate, and is on the Calendar, providing for instruction as to the effect of alcohol and other narcotics on the human system, in the common schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, wherein the United States has undoubted authority and can prescribe whatever course of study it sees fit. If such a provision were attached to this bill, it would carry of course by national legislation the provision into the common-school system of all the States, or impose upon them the necessity of rejecting the apportionment which they are to receive under the bill. The Senator may or may not be aware that some sixteen States of the United States have already adopted such a bill by State action, and that it is a sort of instruction which is going rapidly into the common schools. I wish I could see my way, being a strict constructionist of the Constitution, to advocate this as an amendment to the pending bill, but I can not do so.

Mr. GRAY. I do not exactly understand how the amendment of the Senator from Kansas can encounter the constitutional scruples of the Senator from New Hampshire, inasmuch as the whole theory of the bill is that it is a condition, and if it becomes operative at all it is only by the acceptance by the States of the bounty that is proposed, loaded down with the conditions that the bill proposes. I do not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas contemplates anything other or less than imposing an additional condition upon the acceptance of this bounty from the Government.

Mr. BLAIR. I am delighted to know that whenever we shall reach the temperance-instruction bill to which the Senator from Kansas has alluded we are sure of the co-operation of the Senator from Delaware. That is something to which I had not looked forward with the utmost confidence; and now I assure him that I feel greatly relieved and perfectly confident of the final passage of that bill, as I already do of this one.

The Senator suggests that it would not be unconstitutional to carry the provisions of that bill into the common schools of the States for the reason that this bill already contains a provision that a State must first assent before this appropriation shall become operative at all in its jurisdiction, but I think there is a fair prospect that the bill will be amended before we get through in that particular, so that the assent of a State by the formal action of its Legislature will not be required.

Mr. GRAY. I am happy to relieve the mind of the Senator from New Hampshire from any doubts he may have had about the views of so humble an individual as myself on this question, and I will state here and now that I am heartily in favor of such instruction in the common schools of the States. I merely rose, however, to suggest to the Senator that this condition no more than any other condition would violate the arguments and reasoning by which the constitutionality of the bill has been supported, in that it is a condition imposed upon the acceptance of the bounty from the General Government.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I fear the Greeks bearing gifts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 5, line 4, after "United States," it is proposed to insert:

> And instruction in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the nature of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics, and of their effect upon the human system.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say but a word or two on this amendment, since it seems to be seriously pressed. What I desire to say is that I understand this is a condition which the States must comply with in order to get the benefit of this fund. I state that it would be impossible at first that the State of Mississippi at least should be able to comply with that condition. The colored schools of that State are mainly taught by colored men and women, who are entirely competent to teach the ordinary branches taught in common schools, reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, grammar, and history of the United States, but they are not competent generally to lecture upon physiology and the other matters embraced in the amendment; so if the amendment is passed and those studies are required to be taught this matter, the result would be that the State could not comply with it in a large number of instances, and a failure in any would be a failure in all; and therefore the State would lose the benefit of the appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. I do not conceive that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money from the national Treasury and to distribute it among the States making as a condition of its reception by any State a change in its common-school system. To do that would be to prescribe common-school systems to States and to interfere in the most direct manner with them. There can be no more direct manner of asserting control over the common schools of the States than to do that.

Section 5 as it stands is not, in my judgment, a contradiction of that principle, because it is not a condition in substance and effect, whatever it may be in phraseology. It is a definition; it is the universally recognized definition of common-school education, and the things which it contains are universally taught. The bill goes on to say that it shall be deemed a common-school education if it has these things in it, and such other things as the local laws of the States may prescribe. But if you undertake to make a new branch, however desirable it is that it should be taught, like hygiene, or the proposition of Mrs. Hunt (which I heartily favor) of teaching in the common schools the relation of alcoholic drinks to human health and life, however excellent that may be, you have then for the first time put into the bill a proposition on the part of Congress to dictate to the States and to control the States in the matter of their common-school system. The common-school system then is regulated to that extent by Congress. Therefore, I am utterly opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts evidently has not read this bill or he would not have committed himself to it heretofore as strongly as he has, judging by the position he just now takes. The bill does not provide that the instruction shall be according to the curriculum, if you may so call it, laid down now by State authority or established by that authority hereafter, but it provides a system of education itself, separate and apart from and in addition to that provided by the several States, of which instruction in hygiene, &c., is no more a violation of the Constitution than that already provided. Section 5 is in these words:

> That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

That is a specific direction that this money shall only be expended for the purpose of teaching these particular branches of knowledge.

Mr. HOAR. "And such other branches."

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly; that is to say, the ones that are named. We have a right to name physiology and hygiene just as much as we have a right to name United States history.

Responding to what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] says, I hope he does not suppose that we are to have as the result of this measure the worn-out and effete methods of teaching which are now prevalent in the State of Mississippi and elsewhere. By confession something has to be remedied down there. We are approaching this subject of national education because the States have not done their duty in this particular, because their systems are defective, because the people are slothful and indifferent in regard to the great question of popular education, because they are not willing to tax themselves according to their ability to pay in order that the youth of school age within their respective limits may have the benefits of common-school education.

Mr. President, we are to have something different and something better than what we have had before. The United States Government does not enter upon this subject except it be for the purpose of making things better than they are now. Therefore we shall have teachers who will teach physiology and hygiene as well as American history, and I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not lay the comfort to himself that he seems to imply in his remarks that they are to go on in the old-fashioned, indifferent, easy-going way that they have heretofore, but we are to have some more force and some more ability and energy and addition of scope to the system of Mississippi and Alabama and Texas and so on than we have heretofore had. If we are not to have it, then what is the purpose of this bill? If it is simply to recognize what is now existing, and perpetuate it and maintain it, why pass this provision for an appropriation of $77,000,000 or $79,000,000, as I believe it is now?

So, Mr. President, if we are to enter upon this subject, let the instruction to be given be commensurate with the power, with the intelligence of the American people, backed up by the National Government. We are only on the threshold of this matter now, but before we get through we shall have to add to this $77,000,000 untold millions more, and if the money is to be used for any useful purpose, let the power and the purpose of the National Government to improve that system of education which confessedly is so inadequate be manifested by such directions as shall give ample effect to every dollar of this money.

It is a little late, I think, now to suggest that we are entering upon an unconstitutional field. If we can require the governors of States to give us information in regard to the number of school children and all the details of the school system as administered in the several States, and if we can prescribe the teaching of the history of the United States, we can prescribe any other kind of teaching that we see fit, and we can not only prescribe that, but we can say what kind of a history of the United States shall be used as a school-book in these various schools; and if what I have been told is true on the subject of the histories that are being used now in the Southern States, the very beginning of this reform, the very first step in regard to the expenditure of this public money ought to be to prescribe a new history of the United States to be put in use among the youths of the Southern States in order that they may be brought up patriotic as well as intelligent citizens, which they ought to be. It will not do now to say that the Government has not got the power to attach just what conditions it pleases to the expenditure of this money. This has all been innocuous enough on the surface, but underneath it all is that very purpose.

To this complexion we must come at last.

The National Government will follow, as it has a right to do and as it ought to do if it expends the money, every single dollar of it into the smallest school-house in the Southern States and in the Northern States as well, to prescribe the persons who shall teach, what they shall teach, and every other thing that goes to and concerns the regulation of every school in the United States where this money is spent.

If it is well enough that the Committee on Education and Labor should report a bill that in all the schools of the District of Columbia and in all the Army and the Navy schools, and in every other school or place where teaching is the result of national expenditure these principles of hygiene shall be taught, why shall we withhold our command that that instruction shall be given when we enter this great national theater, embracing, as it does, not merely the soldiers in the Army of the United States, not merely the small school population of the District of Columbia, but the millions upon whom this Government is to rest in the future? Why should we withhold from them this most useful instruction? Why go at this in a homeopathic way, as though we wanted to experiment upon somebody who might be killed without any very great danger, and yet not apply it to the great mass of the people who are to be benefited by it and through whom the country is to be benefited if it is a good thing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PUGH (when Mr. BROWN's name was called). I am requested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to state that he is paired with my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] on the question.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I announce again my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], who is absent.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN. I understand that my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has been announced. His colleague [Mr. PUGH] is satisfied he would vote against the amendment if here, and as I am against it, I wish to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Conger,	Gray,	Mahone,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hale,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Frye,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—34.

Berry,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pugh,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Blair,	Evarts,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	George,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Call,	Hampton,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Chace,	Harris,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Walthall.
Coke,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Palmer,

ABSENT—30.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,

Cameron,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Dawes,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment, to add at the end of section 10:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent any State or Territory from applying the money provided in this act to industrial education as a part of its common-school system of instruction.

Mr. President, I regard this amendment as essential to any proper system of common school instruction. Mr. Scott Russell, of England, in a report to the Parliament of Great Britain on this subject, made some years ago, says:

Dissatisfied with our national progress, we have turned our minds to search for the cause of our deficiency. We find that during these years some nations have been occupied in diligently promoting the national education of various classes of skilled mechanical workmen for the purpose of giving skill to the unskilled and rendering the skilled more skillful. We find that some nations have gone so far as to have established in every considerable town technical schools for the purpose of teaching all the youths intended to be craftsmen those branches of science which relate most nearly to the principles of their future craft.

This subject came before the consideration of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate, and some of the leading manufacturers and skilled workmen in the United States appeared before the committee. One of them, Mr. John W. Britton, a man of much intelligence and high character, testified as follows:

I will say that I have been a worker for forty-eight years. I have been an employer for thirty-five years. I am a carriage-maker, and a member of the firm of Brewster & Co., Broadway and Forty-seventh street. In that connection I will also state that I am president of a savings-bank. That only bears upon the question as showing the fact that I come in contact with a different class of labor from that employed in my own establishment. Having been a worker myself, I have mixed with working people, and I know them pretty thoroughly. The mechanical classes, however, I am better acquainted with, because all through my mature life I have been in constant communication with them, chiefly, however, as an employer.

He says further:

While on the subject of education I would state that I was chairman of a committee appointed by the Carriage Builders' National Association of the United States, in 1882, on the subject of apprenticeship, and among the duties of that committee was the preparation of an address to the officials having connection with public free education in the United States. That address was issued in large numbers to these officials. With the permission of the committee I will read it:

"To officials and official bodies in the United States having the supervision of public education:

"The Carriage Builders' National Association of the United States, in behalf of the industry represented by them and of other mechanical industries of our country, beg leave to call your attention to the necessity of some change in the course of study in our public schools that will pepare those who intend to become apprentices in trades and mechanical pursuits requiring a high standard of taste and skill.

"This association, having recently established in New York city a school for the advancement of technical knowledge among the apprentices and young mechanics of our trade, have at the outset been met with the serious obstacle that very few of the pupils, although they may have attended the public schools of this and other cities, have had any instruction in free-hand drawing and geometry, so necessary to all who wish to engage in the higher mechanical pursuits.

"We are well aware that the studies above referred to are included in the ordinary school course in many of the cities and towns, but we beg leave to call your attention to the fact that boys intending to learn trades leave school earlier than those intending to follow the professions and other pursuits, and usually before reaching that part of the school course in which free-hand drawing and geometry are taught. Thus they are deprived of the very studies which they specially need to make them skilled and intelligent mechanics.

"Your attention is further called to the fact that the advance already made in the mechanical arts in this country calls for a higher standard of taste and skill than heretofore, and there is every evidence that a still greater demand for skilled workmen will arise from year to year in order that in our rapidly increasing production we may successfully compete in the markets of the world with the manufacturers of other countries. At present we are dependent in a great measure upon artisans educated in their trades abroad; but the number of this class seeking our shores for employment is lessening every year, and has almost entirely ceased in many of the trades calling for the higher skill. The lack, too, of any well established apprenticeship system in this country precludes any relief in the near future from that source."

This testimony further establishes the fact that it is a necessity for the continuance of our mechanical skill and successful competition with other nations to have a system of primary instruction in the arts and trades attached to the public schools of the country. Mr. William Steinway, of the celebrated firm of piano-makers, also testified:

The total want of industrial schools in this city is a very great evil. There ought to be industrial schools all over each city where boys can go and find for what business they have aptitude and talent. Then, under regular apprentice laws, under which a boy could be bound for, say, five years at rising wages, commencing at $3 a week for the first year, getting $3.50 the second year, $4 a week the third year, and so on, they would learn a trade well. During the last two or three years the employer could have the advantage, since during the first one or two years he lost.

Every now and then respectable men come to me—farmers, &c.—having boys of sixteen or seventeen years of age, and wanting them to learn the piano trade. We can not take any apprentices, because the boy takes up the place of a man; but in smaller shops they could do so. Still, nobody will take the boy, because the moment he has learned one of the fifteen or eighteen branches of the trade he shifts for himself. Although he has learned the business improperly, still he starts out, and thus it is that not only the piano trade, but most of the woodwork business is shut out from American boys. That is a great evil.

* * * * * * *

Having gone through the panics of 1861, 1867, and 1873, I know that skilled artisans are absolutely independent of bad times, for a skilled workman will always find employment.

The testimony of Mr. John Swinton, formerly of the New York Sun newspaper, a man of extensive information, devoted to the interests of the workingmen, states that there are not less than ten thousand persons who die from starvation because of the bad sanitary conditions, incident on the want of remunerative employment, in the city of New York annually. In France, Saxony, Bavaria, Westphalia, and the German States they have an elaborate system of industrial education connected with their public schools and extending throughout the community. Mr. Edward King testifies:

In Boston there is one of the most striking evidences of the feasibility of educating boys, and in some cases girls, and certainly the feasibility of interesting and educating adult workingmen in the "Industrial School" (I think they call it in Boston), an account of which will be found in Mr. Eaton's report to the Senate on industrial education. But when I was in Boston myself I was at that time informed by those who were interested in that school that it originally started in a church, by simply taking some of the boys from the gutters and giving them jack-knives and pieces of wood and teaching them to cut things of a definite shape. I think they called it the "whittling class"—taking the boys in and putting them on benches on week evenings. Those boys showed such interest and the teachers had such success in their notions that they finally got portable benches and had them screwed onto the sides of the pews; and the class kept getting larger and larger, and by and by it became so large, and they were so sure of a successful movement, that they obtained a room in some one of the Government buildings, and then they obtained chisels and other tools besides regular work-benches, and had a set of rules for the government of the school, and it was altogether so successful that it has developed now into an institution for practical technical instruction.

THE RUSSIAN METHOD OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

At this point I should like to say that the committee will find, if they have not already found, in the report of Mr. Eaton, that the system of technical education introduced first, I think, by Principal Runkle (I think that is his name), of the technological college in Boston, known as the "Russian system," is the one that I think above all others should have the preference, and that is the system of technical education which is least open to the objections that would certainly be raised in the event of the Federal Government taking this matter in hand. I notice that in the case of a witness who testified on this stand on the subject of technical education there was a little editorial article in one of the daily papers to the effect that the gentleman was evidently not aware that people who had no interest in mechanical subjects—general tax-payers—would be taxed for giving a special kind of education to a part of the community.

I would urge that the value of the Russian method of technical education is such that it is not open to any such objection, inasmuch as the work is applied to forms of material which are not to be used for any constructive or business purpose, but are so invented as to demand all kinds of manipulation which would be necessary in any kind of industry, and that in the event even of pupils being destined for a commercial career, the education which they obtain under this method of instruction is an education of their faculties—of their objective powers. It will always be of value to them, and it will be of value to any person, whether he undertakes to follow the life of a mechanic or a life of commerce, or anything else.

I think that a fair examination on the subject will show this committee that a technical education on the Russian system applied in the primary schools, as has been advocated, and demonstrated in Boston to be successful in, I think, a grammar school, as will be found in the report of Mr. Eaton to the Senate, would be successful if applied everywhere. That report demonstrates the feasibility and practicability of the matter I am now advocating.

I believe also that if our Government were to imitate the English method they would have here a far greater success than they have ever had in England. I believe that the American school-boy is so much sharper, is naturally so much more apt a pupil, and his bent of mind is of such a practical character that if the Government of the United States were to make any decent effort in this direction I am positive personally that they would meet with a far greater success than even the Government of England has made.

ECONOMIC VALUE OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

The economic value of this is beyond question. It is calculated by Mr. J. Scott Russell, the builder of the "Great Eastern" steamship (and one of the greatest authorities in England on technical education, a man of practical business experience beyond question, and by no means a theorist), that about $125 is all the expense that the English Government was put to in educating each of the workmen who have passed through her technical scheme of education, and that $125 per annum represents, according to him, the technically educated workman over an unskilled or technically uneducated man. One year's economic value, according to Mr. Russell's calculation, pays the teacher and the expense of technically educating such a workman. And if that is true in England, I think it would be to a far larger extent true in America.

* * * * * * *

Let America take note that it is the educated skilled labor, and not pauper labor, as so many believe, which she has good reason to fear and against which she can defend herself only by educating her workingmen equally well.

Mr. President, I could multiply these citations indefinitely from all the practical and successful managers of our large establishments in the United States who are interested in education. They all condemn our system of relying simply upon teaching the child to read and write with great force and impressiveness. Mr. Swinton laid before the committee a formidable and terrible statement as to want and degradation and absolute suffering among the laboring people of Northern cities and communities, and boldly charged that if the Bureau of Labor will do its duty it will present a skeleton so ghastly in every community of death and starvation and suffering, even among the people of our communities where common-school education is best established, as will be appalling.

You only need to read the evidence of the committee to be satisfied of this fact. We have now the examples in England, Germany, and France of systems of instruction in technical education applied to the common schools to primary instruction by which every child is taught the elements necessary in the different trades and is prepared to engage in any of them; and we have the evidence here that our factories, our carriage-makers, as Mr. Brewster especially testifies, have to obtain from Germany the young men who are capable of being educated rapidly in the trades, who are prepared for it—receiving compensation all the time. So of the piano-makers in Mr. Steinway's great establishment, and so of all the other crafts. We have had before that committee their representative men, and their testimony is uniform and to the point that we are getting behind the age with its great inventions substituting machinery for human labor by not having in every State a system of industrial education attached to the primary common schools and going hand in hand with the usual common-school education.

This bill will be comparatively worthless unless we adopt that which in this age of invention every other nation which has made great progress in the arts has adopted. We can not be friends of the laboring people, of the great mass of the people, unless we give the means of learning how to earn a comfortable living. All your speeches about equality before the law will be an empty delusion while we leave them men, women, and children to starve because they have not been taught the practical things which will enable them to earn a comfortable support. Reading and writing does not enable of itself either men or women to labor in the trades and arts which furnish them employment and support. Without the practical knowledge which industrial education affords it will not enable them to perform any of the duties of a citizen either to themselves or the state.

I will not delay the Senate by urging this matter further. Of the polytechnic schools of Germany, Sir Edmund Franklin in his report to the English Parliament in 1867 says:

In the polytechnic schools of Germany and Switzerland the future manufacturer or manager is made familiar with those laws and applications of the great natural forces which must always form the basis of every intelligent and progressive industry. It seems that this superiority more than counterbalances the undoubted advantage which this country has in raw material.

Mr. J. P. Worth, in June 3, 1867, said:

In the matter of primary education, England is well abreast of Austria, France, and Prussia. In the matter of all that tends to connect the workman with the artisan, Austria, France, and Prussia were clearly passing us.

Now in this country there is practically outside of New York, in Mr. Peter Cooper's great institute, and outside of Boston, no attention paid to this connection of industrial education with primary education; but in Russia even, in Germany, in all France, the necessity of providing for the support of the people, the necessity of relieving pauperism, has induced them with enlightened prevision of the future to establish industrial education as a part and parcel of the education of every child. I therefore hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida, if I understood him correctly, stated that Mr. Swinton testified before the Committee on Education and Labor that twelve thousand men starved annually in New York city. The statement, as I recollect it—I have not the book before me—was that that number of infants and young children died in consequence of the lack of proper food, proper nursing, and such attention as the community should furnish to its children. That was the statement.

Mr. CALL. I will read the statement.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well. I think it was no statement that twelve thousand grown men starved annually in New York.

Mr. CALL. This is the statement:

The CHAIRMAN. I was not prepared to learn that New York, left to herself, unfed by immigration from foreign countries or from other parts of our own country, would so rapidly disappear. I thought she was growing of herself; but it would seem, from your statement—

That is Mr. Swinton's statement—that she is being fed simply as the fires of the sun may be fed, by matters drawn in from outside, by absorbing another world or two.

The WITNESS. I would have but to send across the street to get these reports of our board of health. The facts are not disputed. I estimate that of the deaths here, at least ten thousand every year are by starvation. I believe that between ten thousand and twelve thousand people die of starvation in this city every year.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean a prolonged condition of insufficient nutrition, which is equivalent to starvation.

The WITNESS. A prolonged condition of inanition. It is classified in the reports as "febrile diseases," as "lung diseases," as "anemia," &c.; it is put under various fine terms to conceal the ghastly fact of 10,000 persons dying here yearly from a lack of the supplies needed for the generation of the forces of life.

He goes on with what it is unnecessary for me to read in this connection.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood that it applied more particularly to mortality among infants and children, but growing out of the fault of the community in not seeing that the poorer classes had proper provision for nursing and care or the means of getting wages that would supply them.

Now, in regard to the main proposition of the Senator, I should be very glad if it could be adopted; but the appropriations under this bill, as the statistics and facts that have come to our knowledge show, will be insufficient to establish common schools in such efficiency as they ought to exist; and really from the funds which we propose to give, were we to undertake to establish technical schools or industrial schools, we should be simply taking what ought to go to the common school itself; that is, instruction in the ordinary branches, which undoubtedly, as the first duty of the State, should precede instruction in the other branches to which the Senator refers.

At all events it would be, I think, necessary to increase the amount of appropriation if we were to take on this feature; and the Senator should remember that this bill will not prevent the States from making appropriations to industrial schools if they see fit, and in this bill we have retained the feature of industrial schools within the Territories and the District of Columbia, so that we can establish within our own undisputed jurisdiction model schools of the kind that he refers to which will be proper subjects of imitation all over the country through all the States.

I hope the Senator will not really press his amendment, for the reason that we have not got enough money for it anyway, and it must tend, I think, to embarrass the bill.

Mr. CALL. The amendment is only permissive. It is not obligatory. It allows this to be done as part of the common-school education, subject to all the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. But we do not undertake to say that the States, if they see a necessity for them, may not establish industrial schools. They may do so to the extent of their entire capacity to bear taxation if they see fit, and it is not to be supposed, even if we give permission to use a portion of this fund for this purpose, that they will do so until they come to have a public opinion which requires the establishment of industrial schools as opposed to common schools, or as an addition to the common-school systems of the States; and when they reach that condition of enlightenment on this subject, they will not hesitate to tax themselves to establish industrial schools. Meanwhile public opinion will be forming, creating a feeling that will look to illustration of the benefit to be derived from industrial schools in the District and Territories if we see fit to establish them, and the States will have something to learn and imitate. Thus we shall have gone as far as we need, it seems to me, unless we can have a much larger appropriation, which we are not likely to get.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This amendment would authorize a State to apply the whole of the money to the sole purpose of industrial education, and, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, it is obvious that the ordinary common-school education must precede industrial education. The boy to be taught to be a machinist must first have been taught to read and write and to do the other things that an ordinary common-school education teaches him to do before he can understand the principles of mechanics and read the books which he must read, receive the instruction which he must receive in what is called an industrial education. I hope, therefore, most clearly that the thing will not be adopted.

Mr. CALL. I have no doubt that the amendment will be adopted without the sanction of the chairman of the committee or the Senator from Vermont; but I do not care anything about the bill without that kind of education as far as I am concerned unless that which teaches the boy and the girl to earn a living.

The report of this committee does exhibit this necessity everywhere throughout this country; and the demand will come up here in such terms that the Congress of the United States will yield to it and agree that while the working people of this country are in a state of want and a state of suffering, and while there is oppression among them which ought to be remedied, there is no other way to remedy it, as they themselves testified uniformly before this Committee on Education and Labor, as their associations, their labor organizations testify, there is no other way to do it but by a system of industrial education; and that industrial education may commence to-morrow with the primer, with the grammar, and ought to commence. It is so in Germany.

Side by side with the very first elements of learning the children have utensils placed in their hands and are taught the elements of drawing, which is one of the primary and essential conditions of a skilled workman in all the trades. This system which is frowned upon by the Senator from Vermont is one by which the workman can be made adequate to the needs of to-day with its great inventions, in which machinery takes the place of human labor; and if I had it in my power I would give $100,000,000 to the encouragement of the States, to be granted to them on condition that an industrial school was opened in every community, and that every child in the United States had access to it. I do not care for the bill without that kind of education.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to say one word, because I myself would like to see industrial schools established everywhere, but not by this bill. This bill, as I understand it, proceeds upon the theory of removing illiteracy, and that is the whole theory of the bill.

Mr. CALL. It is not my theory.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that is the theory of the bill. For that reason I hope the amendment of the Senator from Florida will not be adopted, and for no other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must ask two minutes with the indulgence of the Senate to reply to the Senator from Florida.

I do not think, according to my information and observation, that the trouble of the working people of this country is from a want of industrial education; but it is that the working people of this country, the great mass of them being intelligent enough to earn their bread in their various callings, can not find employment, or finding it can not get the wages that they are fairly entitled to. That is the matter with the great mass of the working people of this country; not that it would not be very desirable to teach their children every branch of industrial education just as far as it is possible in the years of childhood. I am for that. But when we are undertaking to aid the States in the rudiments of education in order that their children may be competent to take up the ordinary avocations of life, as they are now, when they grow up, that they may have some means of understanding their rights and the ways of getting on in this world, I do not propose that they shall be taught in their childhood by this money, as the amendment provides for, exclusively how to work and to operate machinery and things of that sort, instead of being taught the things that in the changing affairs of this country it is necessary they should know how to take up.

I repeat that in my opinion the misfortune of the working people of this country is not now a want of intelligence; it is a want of employment at adequate wages and fair play between themselves and capitalists and corporations.

Mr. CALL. I do not agree with the Senator from Vermont. Where a man fails to find employment it is because he is not educated to know how to do the work that is demanded by the country. The machinery of the country is taking the place of labor, and that is the complaint of the workmen. A machine will do the work of a thousand men. Trades by hand that furnished thousands of people in Massachusetts with employment are now being substituted by machinery; and so it is in all the trades, and so it is stated in this report. It is so stated by Mr. Russell, who speaks of the advocates of industrial education in England. When you educate the artisan so that he can turn from making one piece of a shoe which he has been accustomed to all his life to any other trade or occupation, when he has obtained the elements of an industrial education, he may find support in some other pursuit of life. Subdivision and distribution of labor makes that practicable, and the Senator from Vermont differs with all these practical men who are themselves the employers of labor in the great factories in his own country. They testify in this book, without an exception, to the necessity of an industrial education as a part of the primary education of the children of the country.

Mr. Richard J. Hinton testifies:

Q. I understood you to say that in France and Germany they had adopted as part of their public system industrial schools teaching trades and the arts?

A. Germany has a very elaborate system. My more thorough knowledge would go back almost to the beginning of the present German Empire. Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Westphalia, and other German states will have a very elaborate system, nearly all of them, in connection with the government. They will all have a school of forestry, they will all have a school in connection with the postal system for teaching logistics and many things connected with that. They now have in Prussia, and I think there are imperial schools in connection with the railroad system, as most of the great through railroad routes have passed under the control of the imperial government. Then different states and different communities will have, in connection with their system of primary and secondary schools, special schools for teaching different avocations or different semi-professional pursuits. In France, as far as I now understand, the system seems to have been more communal and local, more civic than national. In Besançon, for instance, they will have a very elaborate watch school. They make a great many watches. At Mülhausen, before it passed under German rule—I was there in 1873—there were seven or eight very fine institutions or schools for teaching the different branches of weaving, designing, and everything connected with it.

Mr. President, if we are so anxious for the welfare of the working people, for the education of the children of the country, why shall we not do what these despotic governments have done? The testimony is here that since this system of industrial education was established pauperism has decreased, the general condition of the workingman has improved, so that to-day in Paris it is difficult to find a meritorious person suffering from want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move an amendment to come in at the close of section 5:

And copies of all school books authorized by the school boards or other authorities of the respective States and Territories used in the schools of the same shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior and approved by him before apportionment of the money appropriated herein shall be made

The objection that could be urged to this amendment is that suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts that it would make this bill unconstitutional. I have been somewhat amused to find that the Constitution is ample enough to take in all the provisions of this bill as reported from the committee, intricate and far-reaching as they are, but when any amendment is proposed making more definite and certain in any way the extent of national power over the expenditure of the national money, then the cry is at once made that it invades the Constitution. There is just as much in the character of the instruction as there can be in the instruction itself; and if this money is to be usefully spent, if the idea is that we are to have a good result grow out of it, then we ought at every step of the expenditure to so control it that the result may not belie the expectation.

Not only that, but as is suggested it is the duty of the Government to so control it. Where is the guarantee that this money, so generously to be furnished, will produce the result of improving the situation in the South? Practically we offer a premium by the bill as it stands for the continuation of the present illiteracy, because it is by the continuation of illiteracy that the large sums in the future are to be apportioned; and if the illiteracy itself is not to be removed, then of course no good purpose will be subserved by the appropriation of this money.

Mr. President, I have in my hands a history of the United States printed and published for use in the Southern States, and which I am advised has been and most probably now is used in the schools of that section. I wish my friend from Massachusetts who makes such rasping speeches in Massachusetts and such humane and catholic ones in the Senate would take this book home with him and see whether he thinks the teachings contained in it are such as ought to be encouraged by the expenditure of money out of the national Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean to imply by that statement that I have made speeches in the Senate of a character different from those I have made in Massachusetts?

Mr. PLUMB. I did not mean any reflection on the Senator. The Senator made some speeches, I know, in the last campaign, at least I read them, about the frauds in the Southern States, implying that he did not trust the South very much, and yet——

Mr. HOAR. Have I not said the same things here?

Mr. PLUMB. I was fairly overwhelmed by the catholicity of his speech the other day on this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator if he means to insinuate or imply that the doctrines which I have expressed in Massachusetts in condemnation and abhorence of the election outrages in the South, I have not whenever there was a proper opportunity expressed here, that I have not gone to the extreme of my power in endeavoring to get the national authority to put them down; or whether he means to imply on the other hand that I have not maintained for the last sixteen years the doctrine about extending national aid to education at the South at home as I have here? I know my honerable friend does not mean to state anything which would seem to be a reflection on me.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not mean to make any reflection at all. I mean simply to compare the degree of confidence which the Senator has in regard to the expenditure of school money with that entire lack of confidence which he has expressed in regard to the action of the Southern people in relation to elections. That was all. The contrast is quite marked, it seems to me.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend will permit me to say a word; I do not wish to interrupt him. I think the two propositions are absolutely reconcilable. I was in favor of trusting the South, after the rebellion, with the suffrage again. I did not think we could conduct this nation with a lot of vassal States and subject citizens, Americans who had not the rights of Americans, whatever offense had been given. I knew we were taking a great risk, as all republican government is a great risk. It proceeds on confidence in human nature, on confidence in the belief that in the end what is right, and righteous, and honest, and wise, will prevail over what is wicked, fraudulent, and foolish. Now I am willing to trust the Southern States, under the conditions and safeguards of this bill, with the administration of this money for an object which is as essential to republican government as equal rights of suffrage, taking the same risk I know and guarding against it as well as I can, as I did in the case of the suffrage. I do it with the same confidence in the ultimate result and in the manhood and honor of the American people. I have not made a speech on the subject of Southern elections anywhere in my life, at home or abroad, that I have not reiterated and reiterated and reiterated my belief in the policy which this bill adopts.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, the Senator is welcome to his belief in his consistency. I do not express any opinion one way or the other. But it seemed a little remarkable to me that he should have expressed so great confidence in the entire integrity of the Southern people in regard to the expenditure of this money, in so expending it as to accomplish the national purpose which he had in view, while at the same time he was so lacking in confidence as to the care with which they secure the ballot of the black man. I leave the case, however, as it is now made up.

I have in my hand, as I was proceeding to say, a copy of the history of the United States of America, entitled:

New School History of the United States of America, from the earliest discoveries to the present time, by J. S. Blackburn, principal of "Alexandria High School," Virginia, and W. N. McDonald, A. M., principal of the Male High School of Louisville, Kentucky. Fourth edition revised. Baltimore: W. J. C. Dulany & Co. 1871.

Mr. BLAIR. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one?

Mr. PLUMB. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one. This book has all the marks of usage; I think it has been used before it came into the Library. There can not be any doubt about the authenticity of it. I am bound to express the hope that histories of this kind are not used in all the schools of the Southern States; but yet I can say this, that if this history is in use in any of them the National Government ought to require its extirpation before spending this money; it ought not to be permitted to be used in any school, especially where the Government money goes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has gone into a state of innocuous desuetude now!

Mr. PLUMB. I am glad to know that that is the case, and yet the very fact that it is in existence is a sufficient warrant for proposing and voting for the amendment which I have suggested.

I would have been willing to accept any history for use in the Southern States if it would have been thereby agreeable to everybody that should have left out entirely—had a blank page to alone recall the war for the Union; but that which assumes to be a history which deliberately falsifies, which is printed and published and used for the sole purpose of magnifying the cause against the Union, which characterizes the Northern armies as composed almost wholly of European immigrants, of rowdies, roughs, &c., and has naught but contumely for the commanders and the armies under them on the Union side and a great deal worse, ought not to be used as a text-book in schools supported by moneys from the national Treasury.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] asks me where it is used. I do not personally know that it is now used at all, but I have been told to-day, and by a Southern man, that this was not by any means a good sample, because it failed to be as bad as many histories that are or have been used to his personal knowledge in the South.

We may differ about the merits of that great struggle and about the merits of the various armies engaged, about their achievements and the skill of those who led them; but there is no necessity that facts should be misstated, and it is not proper that money from the national Treasury should be used to educate the rising generation to have a contempt for the Government and for the whole people of the North, who are represented as cowards and paltroons in this book, and as everything else but the manly and the brave and the patriotic soldiers that they were.

I should like to know something about the kind of teaching that is to follow this money. I assume that this bill is to pass. I have no doubt that that is to be the result. I want therefore that whatever result may flow from it shall be a good one. I want the National Government to keep such control over this money and the purpose it is to accomplish that the people of the United States may know that their bounty is not misapplied and that under no pretense shall this money levied chiefly from the North be used to inculcate the seeds of a new war or shall do anything in the direction of widening whatever gap may exist between the North and South.

There is a good deal of talk about the necessity for peace between what are called the sections of this country and about the unwisdom of what is called sectionalism; but, Mr. President, there is to be no peace and no lack of this same sectionalism so long as sentiments such as are written in this book are inculcated in the schools of the South or in the schools of any other portion of the country. I have made a somewhat hasty examination of school books that have been published and used in the North, and I never yet have seen in one of them anything calculated to bring contempt upon the Southern people as a people, or upon the Southern armies, or upon the generals who led those armies; and I have never known of any one in public or in private among Northern men to utter any sentiment but that of personal respect for the valor and the fidelity of the men who fought the battles of the seceding States in that great controversy.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to state to him, speaking for one State, that the history used in the common schools of that State is written by a Northern historian, published by a Northern publishing house, and while I do not think it is entirely fair to us, we have accepted it and adopted it; and yet I am in favor of this bill and would not think of putting a history in between the education of the children and what may appear in the history. They get that around their hearth-stones.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Virginia was a meritorious soldier on the Southern side. I would not have expected any less frank and manly declaration from him than the one he has made. Northern types, however, and Northern authors will make work for any market. The mere fact of this work having been printed in Baltimore is nothing against it. I have been told, on what seemed to be very good authority, too, that the school histories which have been printed by Northern publishers for use in the South have been so printed under orders or in deference to a sentiment which required that the history of the war of the rebellion therein contained should be of a wholly different character from that contained in school histories printed for use in the schools of the Northern States.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is a history written entirely from a Northern standpoint. We do not object to it, because if it does nothing more it teaches the children to read. It does not do, in my humble judgment, justice to our own section, but we do not complain of that. We know all about what occurred during the war, and we are satisfied with its results. We only want to teach our children to read, and we are even willing to teach them to read from Northern histories. We use no history in Virginia that was not written by a Northern historian and from a Northern standpoint so far as the war is concerned, that has been adopted in our common schools.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no objection and can be none to any proper statement of the result of every single battle or occurrence of any kind or description during that period; but any book that does as this book does, habitually speak in a contemptuous and disparaging manner not only of the Northern armies but of the Northern people, is not a book calculated to bring eternal peace, that national feeling which will wipe out in time all the exasperating memories of that great struggle and which will make this a nation in fact as well as in name.

I think, therefore, that when we come to spend this money we should have the same control over it that the States have over theirs, that along with the money shall go our right to say what shall be taught, the instrumentalities to be employed for the purpose of teaching, and everything else that ought to go with the sinews, without which this education can not be given, according to the statement of those from the South who advocate the passage of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say that I think my honorable friend from Kansas manifests rather more confidence in Southern opinion in his action than he does in his speech. As I understand it, his proposition is to remedy the evil of this school book printed in 1871 by putting the school books of the whole country, North and South, under the direction of Mr. Secretary Lamar.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Lamar may be as bad as the Senator from Massachusetts intimates that he is——

Mr. HOAR. I did not intimate anything about his badness or goodness.

Mr. PLUMB. But probably in the course of a few years we may have another Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOAR. I merely stated what the proposition of the Senator was.

ACCOUNTS WITH UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to introduce a resolution now, as I shall have to leave the Senate, which is important to be acted on, if at all, to-day. I ask that it be read.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what, if any, amount of money has been expended by the United States in behalf of the Territory of Utah since the passage of the act of Congress of June 23, 1874, entitled "An act in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah;" and if any such money has been so expended, whether the United States has been reimbursed therefor; and that pending the answer to this resolution, and until an investigation of the subject may be had by Congress, the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior are hereby requested to withhold any and all compensation or allowance to any member or officer of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to make a statement of the case in a word or two.

I understand the fact to be that Utah Territory is indebted to the United States nearly $300,000. I have a letter before me stating that fact. The Legislature has been in session some sixty days and has done nothing, but the members are now calling for their pay, and the Secretary of the Treasury, unless something is done to cause him to withhold action in sending a warrant for that purpose, will feel himself compelled to do it. I ask that the resolution be adopted so that the Secretary will be justified in waiting until we investigate the subject before sending the money out.

Mr. HARRIS. Is this a Senate resolution?

Mr. CULLOM. A Senate resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. I object if it leads to debate.

Mr. CULLOM. There is to be no debate. I am through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HOAR. Is this a resolution proposing by one branch of Congress to request the Secretary of the Treasury to abstain from the performance of a legal duty?

Mr. CULLOM. In the first place, the resolution calls upon the Secretary to state the amount of money in which that Territory is indebted to the United States, and in the mean time to withhold sending money to pay the Territorial Legislature until we can ascertain the state of the case.

Mr. HOAR. I think the resolution had better go to the Committee on Territories or some other committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. No, I do not object.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my friend from Illinois that to avoid what seems to be an assertion of authority that the Senate does not possess, he put in after the word "withhold" the words "so far as the law authorizes."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection; but this ought to be done in the interest of the United States. I have in hand a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Durham, which shows a very large amount of indebtedness from the Territory to the Government, and its Legislature has refused to make the appropriation necessary to reimburse the Government of the United States for the current expenses or the amount of money sent out there.

Mr. INGALLS. I should regret to have the Senate committed to the idea that is contained in the last section of the resolution, that it is within the competence of one body or the other to interfere with appropriations which have been made and expenditures which have been directed by existing laws. I sympathize with the object the Senator from Illinois has in view; but I think the very slight reflection we are able to give to it now will convince him that it is hardly competent for us to interfere with a current existing appropriation.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts will remedy the evil that the Senator from Kansas seems to fear.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no doubt at all that the Legislature of Utah have omitted to make appropriations for paying the expenses of the courts, jurors, witnesses, &c., which all the other Territories are bound by law to do and this Territory as well, because they do not like the Congress of the United States.

It is equally clear that the laws of the United States provide for paying out of the Treasury of the United States the salary or per diem of the members of that Territorial Legislature; and I have no doubt, though I have not looked it up, that there is an appropriation now standing in the Treasury out of which these persons are entitled to their pay. The only ground on which the Secretary could refuse to pay them would be that they had been derelict, as they clearly have been, in their duty in taxing the people of that Territory and raising the money to pay these judicial expenses that they ought to pay and that they are bound to pay.

But would that justify, on a resolution of the Senate alone, the Secretary of the Treasury in withholding money that has been appropriated by law for a particular purpose, and the particular persons in whose favor it has been made are entitled to it on the face of the statute, upon the ground that they personally or as a body have misconducted themselves? It may be open to some question. I should be very much afraid the Secretary could not do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. I must object if there is to be debate.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow one further suggestion to see whether there will be any difficulty in consideration of the subject after that? By consent of the Senate I will ask that the resolution be changed into a concurrent resolution, if that will remedy the difficulty.

Mr. INGALLS. A joint resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. Well, a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois modifies the resolution so as to put it in the form of a joint resolution. Is there objection to the present consideration of it in that form?

Mr. BROWN. I object to the further consideration of it at present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations; and

A bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the deficiency bill just received be referred at once to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I now renew the amendment striking out so much as requires the books to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before payment shall be made, simply requiring that they shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 5:

And copies of all school-books authorized by the school boards or other authorities of the respective States and Territories, and used in the schools of the same, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the question is put on that amendment, I would ask the Senator who offers it if that does not leave it in the power of the Secretary of the Interior to require the State to buy new school-books?

Mr. PLUMB. No; it only requires copies of books actually used to be filed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood the amendment in that way. If that is not required, I am satisfied.

Mr. BLAIR. It simply requires a copy of such books as are used to be filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY. I offer an amendment in line 16, section 1, to strike out the word "until" and insert "unless," and to insert in the same line, between the words "shall" and "be," the words "at its next session after this bill shall have become a law."

Mr. EDMUNDS. So as to read how?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 16 of section 1 it is proposed to strike out "until" and insert "unless," and after the word "shall," in the same line, to insert the words "at its next session after this bill shall have become a law;" so as to read:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, unless the Legislature of the State shall at its next session after this bill shall have become a law, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act.

Mr. GRAY. The theory upon which this bill proceeds and the whole line of argument that has been adduced in its support by those who have discussed its constitutionality is that it is not coercive, but is a bill which appropriates the money of the whole people of the United States to be applied to a subject which is confessedly retained by the States in their jurisdiction, but only to be so applied with the consent of the States, and to those States alone which shall consent to the application of this money. To some of us who think that this is an unwarranted entering of a domain of legislation prohibited by the whole scheme of our Constitution and Government to the Federal Legislature it is none the less unconstitutional because the consent of the State is invited as a condition precedent to the exercise of the power contemplated by the bill. In other words, it is denied that there are powers of the Federal Government inhering somewhere in the Federal Constitution that can only be energized and brought into activity by the consent and active co-operation of the State.

Now, for one, I do not feel inclined to leave this bill in such shape that those States, if any there be—and I believe there will be some which will have the fortitude and the self-respect to refuse the bounty, the gift, the appropriation of this money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose set forth in this bill—shall be subject to constant solicitation. I do not want them left in such a position that after this golden stream shall commence to flow from the Federal Treasury their fortitude and integrity shall be constantly and during the whole period of these eight years assailed by this temptation offered by this bill; so that if any State shall accept, it shall accept at the next session of the Legislature which shall meet after this bill shall become a law, and if it do not accept then, that the doors shall be closed, and there shall be no locus pœnitentiæ left in which the States which have neglected or declined to accept can hereafter reconsider their action and come within the corrupting influence that is proposed to be exerted by this bill. That is the object of the amendment, and for that purpose I ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired on this bill with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote on this amendment.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Cockrell,	Hale,	Maxey,	Spooner,
Coke,	Harris,	Plumb,	Van Wyck,
Gray,	Manderson,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the proviso beginning in the fourteenth line of the first section down to the end of the section. The language was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and he agrees that it may be stricken out. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act; and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

That was an amendment put into the bill on the first or second day of the discussion, upon the motion of the Senator from Colorado, and was adopted without consideration by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can not be stricken out now.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that it be done. The Senator upon whose motion the language was inserted is quite willing that it should be stricken out. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] finds difficulty with it, and certainly it is calculated to embarrass the early operation of the bill, because it seems that many Legislatures will not meet for about two years, and if the bill becomes a law either the other States must wait or those States must call special sessions of their Legislatures for action, and in some instances that would be attended with quite a large expense. The Senator from Oregon says that it would cost in his State at least $15,000 to convene the Legislature in extra session. There does not seem to be any occasion for the proviso.

The bill as it was passed at the last Congress had no such provision in it, and there does not seem to be any occasion for it now. Whenever a State brings itself within the conditions prescribed in the bill to the satisfaction of the United States authorities and an apportionment on that representation has been made of the first amount, then there does not seem to be any reason why the proportion which belongs to the State can not go to it without waiting on the action of other States. I hope the proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have been trying to the best of my ability to follow the lead of my distinguished friend from New Hampshire in supporting the bill, but I certainly can not agree to the striking out of the proviso, for the reason that if it be not in the bill and the money is to go without any action of the State, the State law-making power, the sovereignty of the State, the persons into whose hands it goes, the State officers will be under no legal accountability for the money at all; because Congress does not undertake to make those State officials accountable, and any man who embezzled a dollar of it could not be convicted under any statute of the United States, and certainly not under any statute of the State, because the State had not authorized or employed him to receive the money at all. Therefore, in my opinion, it is absolutely essential for the administration of the law that this provision should stand, as inconvenient as it may be.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is there any provision in the bill now which would guide the Secretary of the Interior in making the distribution of the money in case one-third of the States whose Legislatures will not meet for nearly two years should not accept its provisions at the time the law becomes operative? I have no objection to the proviso remaining in the bill if some other provision should be made to meet the difficulty in my mind, and the difficulty which really exists in the execution of this measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know what the other provisions are as to what would become of the money not accepted, some States accepting at once. I do not know how that is, for I have not studied the bill enough, but I do know, or think I know, with great respect to everybody, that you would be sending these millions of dollars, without this proviso, absolutely to sea without any responsibility or legal accountability at all; and whatever may be the inconvenience we must submit to it. If this money goes to a State officer when the State has not authorized him to receive it, he is certainly not responsible to the State, and he could not be convicted for misappropriation or embezzlement or anything else under the State law; and when you should undertake to convict him under any statute of the United States you would find that the United States by this bill has not undertaken to hold in a criminal or personal sense any State official responsible for it, because the United States by the bill does not undertake to control the conduct of schools in the States, and it ought not to do so. It only makes a benefaction to the State, and its sovereign power must receive it according to the will of that sovereign power and make its own officers responsible for it.

Mr. DOLPH. If it were a mere matter of inconvenience, I should not be tenacious about it; but I do not think it is a mere question of inconvenience; I think it is a question of ability under the provisions of the bill to execute its provisions properly. The United States commences to pay out the appropriation made for the first year. The apportionment of other States will not be paid for the first two years, and those States are either to receive the apportionment of two or three annual appropriations at once, or they will first receive their apportionment under the appropriation for the first year, and be deferred from year to year for all the balance, or they will lose the appropriation simply because they have not had the opportunity to accept the provisions of the bill.

As I said before, I have no particular objection to this proviso remaining in the bill if some additional provision shall be put in to meet the difficulty; but I think it will be found that the matter will be involved in so much confusion that it will defeat the very object the friends of the bill have in proposing this measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an inherent difficulty.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no difficulty about it if it is provided, for instance, that if three-fourths of the States or one-half of the States shall first accept the provisions of the bill, the execution of the bill shall be delayed until most of the States have an opportunity to accept its provisions. That would be one way to do it. Another way would be to provide that when a State has accepted the provisions of the bill the State shall have her proportion of the apportionment for the first year, and the next year her proportion of the apportionment for the second year, and so on, so that she shall receive all that she is entitled to; but there ought to be some provision about it, and as the one proposed by me does not seem to meet the idea of the Senate, I would prefer that some friend of the measure who can see the difficulty as well as I can would suggest something else.

Mr. HALE. This proviso is one of the very few absolute safeguards that have been ingrafted on the bill, and I for one object to its being stricken out. Not many obligations are laid upon the States receiving these benefactions. One of the complaints that I and other Senators have made is that it has left things so loose that there will be opportunities to destroy the real object and purpose of the bill, and that because of those dangers the bill is objectionable. But here is the instance of a safeguard which is thrown around the bill. There are few obligations imposed upon the States by the different provisions of the bill, and this is the only provision which declares that no money shall be paid until each State, in the exercise of its discretion and authority as a State, formally accepts the provisions of the bill. If this proviso is stricken out, then the whole thing is left as a loose donation, and every State might receive the money provided in the bill and never agree to accept it under the conditions of the bill, and hereafter Congress and the people and the Treasury would be hopeless.

Therefore I hope that the proviso will not be stricken out, and I trust that the Senator in charge of the bill will not insist on making the motion. Of course he can not make it now except by unanimous consent; but I hope he will not press it when we get the bill into the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. This provision was not in the bill as it was passed in the last Congress. The question whether the provisions of the bill were such as that a State officer, under his obligation as a State officer, receiving this money for the benefit of the State, would be liable criminally or otherwise if he were guilty of malversation in office, was discussed, and it was thought by the lawyers of the Senate then that the bill was well enough guarded, and it was so passed.

I do not believe there is the slightest difficulty in holding any State officer responsible for his proper official liabilities, civilly and criminally, in case he comes in possession of this money for the benefit of his State, and fails to apply it according to his obligation with reference to other moneys the administration whereof may have been intrusted to him.

But it is not well to have any doubt about this matter, and I myself very well understand that if any one deems this provision essential, it should remain in the bill, and I do not press my request for unanimous consent to make the motion now, nor shall I ask for a vote upon the question in the Senate.

I wish to say, however, in reference to the fancied difficulty suggested by the Senator from Oregon that even the worse difficulty is not relieved by his proposition that three-fourths of the States should assent to the bill. Are not the remaining one-fourth of the States involved in precisely the same difficulty which he seems to imagine now will exist without this provision or the provision he suggests with reference to them all? It is only a question of degree, and the proposition which he makes does not relieve against any actual difficulty, for there is none.

The bill provides that, upon the basis or relative illiteracy, each State shall be entitled to a certain proportion of the $7,000,000 the first year, after having complied with the various conditions required, made the showing that is required by the Secretary of the Interior, which must be transmitted to Congress, and upon which Congress must act before even the first appropriation becomes a matter of fact. All that having transpired, each State which brings itself within the provisions of this act is entitled to its proportion, to be applied to the common schools under its jurisdiction. What might go to another State which has not complied with any of the conditions of the bill is a question which does not need to agitate us at present. It is no use to anticipate all the difficulties that might occur in reference to this particular bill. It is as explicit and definite as any proposition ever brought before a legislative body to the minds of those who take pains to examine it for a few hours, and I do not think it is necessary to multiply difficulties which probably will never occur in its actual practice, or which if they do occur can very well be taken care of after they do come to exist.

Mr. DOLPH. I agree with what the Senator from Vermont said the other day, that the best time to amend a bill is when it is under discussion and before its passage. This is not an imaginary difficulty; it is a difficulty that is obvious. I speak now of the State of Oregon because I am familiar with that State; but there are other States in exactly the same situation. The Legislature of Oregon will meet in January, 1887. Suppose the bill passes the Senate at the present session and passes the other House in February, 1887, after the Oregon Legislature has adjourned. Then it will be two years from next January before the Legislature of that State will meet again; and there are other States in precisely the same category.

That is a difficulty which we can see, and it is a difficulty which may be easily provided against now. Some arrangement ought to be made by which the several States that can not accept the provisions of the bill by the action of their Legislature in regular session before 1888 or 1889 shall not be required to call a special session, or else their pro rata share of this appropriation ought not to depend upon a future Legislature for it, because it is easier now to put a simple clause in the bill than it would be to pass an act to rectify the matter after the bill has become a law. We all know the difficulty of getting legislation through both Houses of Congress.

I am not going to take issue with the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee, in regard to how easily the bill may be understood. I think he probably understands it himself, and a good many others do, but I think the provisions are not entirely congruous. I think there are some things left open and undetermined that might just as well be settled.

I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the first section of the bill:

And any State which shall accept the provisions of this act at the first regular session of its Legislature after its passage shall, upon complying with the other provisions of this act, be entitled at once to its pro rata share of all previous appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the bill now.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Illinois says that provision is in the bill now.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I say that is the bill now. I mean by that that such would be the construction of the bill, because the Legislature having to accept it could not accept it until it met.

Mr. DOLPH. But in the mean time the appropriation will be made by Congress and will be expended. We have already adopted a proviso requiring the States to accept it. My State will not have accepted the provisions of the bill and will not have become entitled to its proportion. I forget the precise language of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], whether it provides that the apportionment must be declined by legislative act, or whether merely a failure to accept it throws out the appropriation of a State not accepting its provisions.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator that his State is in exactly the same condition as the State which I have the honor to represent in part. The State of Illinois will not have a convening of the Legislature until the same time that the Legislature of Oregon will meet, and I presume there are many States which are so situated.

Mr. HALE. Almost all of the States are so situated.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see any better way of getting at it than by leaving the bill as it is, and if such States desire to receive the fund at once they will call their Legislatures together. Of course that will be attended with some expense; but you can not fix an amendment here that will apply to the different Legislatures and at the same time preserve the protection that there is in this provision in reference to the fund which is to be turned over by the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment of the Senator from Oregon be read. I think there is some misapprehension about it. It struck me that the amendment was well enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1:

And any State which shall accept the provisions of this act at the first regular session of its Legislature after its passage shall, upon complying with the other provisions of this act, be entitled at once to its pro rata share of all previous appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. HAMPTON. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that it would be better to strike out the word "regular," because some of the Legislatures may not meet regularly for two or three years, and the governor may choose to call an extra session in order that they may act at once.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not know that there is any objection to that, and I will modify the amendment in that particular. My intention is only to prevent the necessity of calling a special session of the Legislature in order to secure the right of a State to this money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be modified by striking out the word "regular."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 1:

And any State which shall accept the provisions of this act at the first session of its Legislature after its passage shall, upon complying with the other provisions of this act, be entitled at once to its pro rata share of all previous appropriations.

Mr. BLAIR. Add the words "or Territory" after "State."

Mr. DOLPH. I will add "or Territory;" so as to read "any State or Territory."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. LOGAN. That does not change the construction or the meaning of the bill as it would be construed, in my judgment. I may be mistaken about it; but the first section provides for the first year the sum of $7,000,000, for the second year $10,000,000, and so on. That is the appropriation to be made by the Congress of the United States. Then the section provides:

Which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

The appropriation is made for that purpose in one grand sum of $7,000,000. Then the proviso follows:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act.

So the money to be apportioned to the State will lie in the Treasury until the State accepts it by an act of the Legislature. The proposition of the Senator from Oregon would not in my judgment change the law in the slightest degree, so far as taking the money is concerned.

Mr. DOLPH. In my judgment it would change it very materially, but of course I would not set up my judgment against that of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, the Senator knows what he means by the amendment; I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to say that it has been contended here that the bill will not make an appropriation of the sum of $77,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. No, it is $7,000,000 the first year, then $10,000,000 the second year, and so on.

Mr. DOLPH. Or $7,000,000. It has been contended that even if the bill passes, the appropriation of $7,000,000 must be put in some one of the annual appropriation bills. There are certain annual appropriations that lapse into the Treasury after the first year if not used.

Mr. LOGAN. In two years.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand that to be the rule, or if the time is two years both appropriations might lapse. As I understand the provisions of the bill, there is to be appropriated the first year by a separate act of Congress $7,000,000, and that is to be appropriated for the first fiscal year after the act is passed. If this act is passed before the 1st of July next the appropriation will be for the fiscal year commencing the 1st day of July next, and so on for each year. Therefore I think it very doubtful whether a State which will not have accepted its provisions would come in for any share of the money appropriated by the bill for the first year; but if it did come in, admit for the sake of the argument that it would receive its share of the appropriation, another difficulty stares us in the face, one which has been suggested before, whether the State would receive all the previous appropriations at once, so as to be placed on a par with the other States, and so that the appropriations for that State would cease at the same time that the appropriations cease for the other States, or whether it would receive its annual appropriation for the first year for which it is able to receive it, and then for the year after that, and be postponed as to the other apportionments from year to year.

I do not believe that any Secretary of the Interior would like to take the responsibility of determining what would be done in that case. It would require further legislation, and it is better to fix it by a simple amendment, like that I have offered, and to fix a certain rule in regard to it, and have no further need of legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as my objection to the amendment is concerned, I only think it is in the bill now; that is all. I do not care anything about the amendment, and I do not think it helps the bill the slightest; but if it is thought to be necessary, of course I have no objection to it.

Mr. DOLPH. That is just where the Senator and myself differ about the construction of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; it is a question of construction.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the first section:

And any State or Territory which shall accept the provisions of this act at the first session of its Legislature after its passage shall, upon complying with the other provisions of this act, be entitled at once to its pro rata share of the previous appropriations.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the words "of the previous appropriations" and insert "under the provisions of this bill," because I do not think it wise to use the word "appropriations," thereby committing the Senate to the proposition that this is in itself an appropriation. That gives the Senator from Oregon all that he desires, and does not commit the Senate to that proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed at the end of the amendment to strike out the words "of the previous appropriations" and insert "under the provisions of this bill;" so as to read:

And any State or Territory which shall accept the provisions of this act at the first session of its Legislature after its passage shall, upon complying with the other provisions of this act, be entitled at once to its pro rata share under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DOLPH. If the bill now would give the States their pro rata share from the beginning, I think the amendment of the Senator from Maine would cut them off certainly, because it would only allow them to take a pro rata share from the time they accepted the provisions of the bill. Certainly I do not think it is the intention of the Senator from Maine to make an inoperative provision.

Mr. HALE. I do not think my amendment is open to that construction. It is only to prevent our enacting something here in the hurried manner in which we are proceeding now that shall commit the Senate to the proposition that the bill in itself is an appropriation bill. I do not think it is. I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon that the appropriations have got to be made in one of the annual appropriation bills, probably the sundry civil bill, and I do not like the word "appropriation" in his amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Would the Senator be satisfied to insert in my amendment the word "annual," so as to read "previous annual appropriations?"

Mr. HALE. Yes; I have no objection to that.

Mr. DOLPH. Therefore I will modify my amendment by inserting the word "annual" before the word "appropriations." I think that will meet the case.

Mr. HALE. That will save the point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I sent to the desk a while ago an amendment which I have modified to meet the objection urged by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and which I should like now to have the Senate act upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2 the following additional proviso:

Provided also, That the Indian Territory shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act, and the money apportioned to said Territory shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall ascertain, in such manner as shall be deemed by him best, the number of illiterates therein. If the Secretary of the Interior shall decide to apportion any of the money provided for in this act to the education of children in the five civilized tribes, he shall pay the money so apportioned to the proper officer of said tribe entitled to receive the same. Sections 3 and 7 of this act shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The trouble I have with the amendment as it now stands is that it leaves it entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior whether the five civilized nations shall be aided in the same way that the people of the States and of the Territories of the United States are aided. If we are going into the Indian Territory at all it seems to me that we ought to make the same donation to the Five Nations that we do to the States and to the organized Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I announce again my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language in the second line of section 3:

That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act.

I assume that that hardly expresses the intention of the committee. "The benefits of the act" of course would be the results that would flow from the expenditure of the money. I move to strike out the words "benefits of" and insert "money under;" so as to read:

That no State or Territory shall receive any of the money under this act, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to. It is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In line 4 of section 3, I move to strike out the words "the character of," after "showing." The report is to show what the common-school system is, not the character of it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made. It is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In lines 15 and 16 of section 3 the language is:

The number of white and colored children of the school age prescribed by this act for each county and city.

There is no school age prescribed by this act for counties and cities, the declaration being the school age in each State and Territory shall be that which shall prevail. I suggest that the words "prescribed by this act for each county and city" are improperly in this section.

Mr. BLAIR. That language has crept in in some of the innumerable amendments that have been offered; it ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will please repeat the amendment; the Clerk did not get it.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out the words "prescribed by this act for each county and city."

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand that that was the Senator's motion. That refers to another part of the bill. The school age referred to is that prescribed by the law of the State or Territory.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, that is not "prescribed by this act." The language is:

The number of white and colored children of the school age prescribed by this act for each county and city.

It should read:

The number of white and colored children of the school age in each city and county.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that there is my enumeration by cities and counties. I am willing that the words "for each county and city" shall be stricken out, if the Senator makes any point about them.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read as suggested to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clause will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3 of the reprinted bill, in lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "prescribed by this act for" and insert "in;" so as to read:

The number of white and colored children of the school age in each county and city, as given by the census of 1880.

Mr. BLAIR. So far as I know there is no such enumeration by the census of 1880, and if that were required to be made before this act could become operative there might be no benefit resulting at all. The words "for each county and city" have crept in in some way. I have never seen them before.

Mr. INGALLS. Then strike them out.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to strike them out.

Mr. INGALLS. If they have crept in, let them creep out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be again read, there still seeming to be a misapprehension in regard to it.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3 of the reprint, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "prescribed by this act for" and to insert the word "in;" so as to read:

The number of white and colored children of the school age in each county and city, as given by the census of 1880, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests that the words "for each county and city" are improperly in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. But if they were put in by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, can they be now stricken out?

Mr. INGALLS. They were not put in on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the words were inserted on motion, they can not be stricken out at this stage.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has proposed an amendment which, as I understand it, would embarrass, if not prevent, the operation of the bill. I wish he would modify his amendment by striking out the words "for each county and city," which would occasion no difficulty. If it is thought best to change the bill still further by making it read "the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory as given by the census of 1880," that would be all right.

Mr. INGALLS. These various provisions are the conditions precedent to the reception by the State of any money under this act, and there ought to be nothing impossible prescribed. Of course I am not primarily in favor of the bill; but if it is to pass I desire that it shall pass in a condition that will be creditable to the body that enacts it. It certainly is unnecessary to impose conditions which can not be complied with. No governor of a State or Territory could comply with the provisions contained between the semicolon after "schools," in line 14, and concluding with the words "1880," in line 17, because there is no enumeration in the census upon which it can be founded. The language is:

The number of white and colored children of the school age prescribed by this act for each county and city, as given by the census of 1880.

That is an insensible provision, and it ought not to be in the bill; it does not mean anything; and as the Senator from New Hampshire says that by some mishap the provisions have been changed or modified by accident, they ought to be corrected so as to carry out the intention of the framers of the bill. If it means that the number of white and colored children of the school age as exhibited by the census of 1880 in the several municipal divisions are to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, that is one thing; but to assume that there has been a school age prescribed by this act for each county and city, and then require the enumeration to be made under it as a preliminary condition to receiving any of this money, would be inconsistent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It seems clear that as far as the census of 1880 is concerned there is no necessity to require any report from the governor of the State or the Territory, because we have it now; we know it just as well as he does. The object of this part of the section is to get a practical report from the State authorities or the Territorial authorities of the condition of their schools in their respective State or Territorial subdivisions, the number of children there of their school age and their colors, which their own school statistics show, as we see by the reports of the Commissioner of Education. I think we ought to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, the words:

This act for each county and city as given by the census of 1880.

And insert:

Law in each of the school subdivisions of each State and Territory.

So that it will read that the governor is to report, &c.—

The number of white and colored children of the school age prescribed by law in each of the school subdivisions of each State and Territory.

So we would call upon the State authorities for a report under their own autonomy, under their own arrangements.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my friend if that would not require a census each year?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; only the school census they have.

Mr. HOAR. The number of scholars enrolled in schools is one thing and the number of children is another thing. It would require a census in my State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it would, stating it in that way; but look at the reports made by the Commissioner of Education as to what are the school arrangements in the various States. Take Vermont, for instance. I find, as the truth and the law is there, that the reports of the State officers to the governor or the Legislature, or whatever the proper office is, are required to show not merely the number of children who attend school—of course we have no distinction of white and colored there—but the number of children of the school age from ten to eighteen, or whatever it is, in each district, and also the number of the children who have attended, and their average daily attendance. So I should think that what I have suggested would only call upon the State authorities to report under their own arrangements and autonomy the statistics that they under all their laws I suppose have of the children in each one of the districts. But if I am wrong, of course I do not insist on it.

Mr. HOAR. There are a great many States in the Union that do not enroll the children except by the school roll. The children are actually enrolled as attending school in some part of the year. The children of the school age, and especially the distinction between white and colored, I do not think we make in our State in any census we have. It seems to me that it would be sufficient for the purposes of the bill to provide that this report shall contain the number of white and colored children between the ages of ten and twenty-one as given by the census of 1880. To be sure that is all in the census now; but the report would have that list from the census, where it could be in each report compared with the average attendance in the school, and we, or the Commissioner of Education, could very easily determine then how large a proportion of the children attended school, because those laws are uniform. That is, suppose the school age in a particular State is from five to fifteen, which the census does not deal with at all, or from ten to sixteen, or any other period, if we have the census return as the basis the proportion between those classes is known for all reasonable purposes, showing a reasonable proximity, and that will give us all the information that we desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment pending is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas to accept that as a modification.

Mr. INGALLS. My attention being diverted for the moment, I did not hear the proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I will restate my proposition. I think in my State there is no census or list of the children annually which would enable this thing to be reported as required by the bill, or as required by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and it would require the States that do not do that to have a census every year of the children between certain ages. So I suggest that it should read:

The number of white and colored children between the ages of ten and twenty-one given by the census of 1880.

And although that is in the census now, it would be convenient to have it in the report for comparison, and it would be very easy to form a jugdment as to whether the children generally attend school or not.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose that was the design, because this is the report required of the governor before the money that is to be distributed under section 2 can be paid out. The language in section 2 is:

And in each State and Territory in which there shall be separate schools, * * * the money received in such State or Territory shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools, respectively, in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years in such State or Territory bear to each other, as shown by the said census.

I presume this is intended to render it obligatory to incorporate in the report the statistics which will enable the money to be disbursed under section 2. I therefore accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, believing that it will effectuate the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 15, after the word "children," it is proposed to insert the words:

Between the ages of ten and twenty-one years.

Mr. HOAR. Strike out the words "of the school age prescribed by this act for" and insert "in."

Mr. CONGER. I suggest as a further amendment, to make it more definite, to add "both inclusive," after "years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the whole amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 15, after the word "children," it is proposed to strike out the words "of the school age prescribed by this act for" and to insert "between the ages of ten and twenty-one years in;" so as to read:

The number of white and colored children between the ages of ten and twenty-one years in each county and city as given by the census of 1880.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all right.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to offer a further amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Let this be adopted first.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Michigan proposes to amend the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. I move an amendment to the amendment by adding the words "both inclusive," after the words "twenty-one years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment accepted?

Mr. INGALLS. That ought not to be put in without further information as to whether the census is based upon that method of enumeration or not.

Mr. BLAIR. It was found out the other day that the census enumerates all the individuals living in the country by their ages; one so many, two so many, three so many, and all the way through, so that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is entirely unobjectionable.

Mr. CONGER. With that view the amendment is an entirely proper one.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be so modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment as now modified by the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 15, after the word "children," insert the words "between the ages of ten and twenty-one years, both inclusive, in," and strike out the words "of the school age prescribed by this act for;" so as to read:

The number of white and colored children between the ages of ten and twenty-one years, both inclusive, in each county and city, as given by the census of 1880.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 3, line 31, I move to strike out the word "thereupon," at the close of the line. It is a superfluous word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 31, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out "thereupon;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act, and also the amounts due to each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 3, line 32, after the word "Treasury," I move to strike out the words "the names of;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps the Senator will amend by adding the word "the" to the clause he proposes to strike out. Otherwise he will have the word "the" in twice, which would seem to be superfluous.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He strikes out the first word "the."

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; that is just the same.

Mr. INGALLS. My motion is to strike out the words "the names of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to section 9, which reads:

That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

I suppose the word "educational" is not used as a word of definition but of general description, and would apply to any fund provided for in the bill. Since the bill was reported the Senate has provided for another fund that in terms it declares shall be expended for school buildings and for rent of the same, and in order to make the provisions harmonious I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that section 9 be changed so as to read:

That no part of the fund allotted to any State or Territory under this act shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it read "under the first section of this act," and shorten the section by leaving out the long words at the end.

Mr. HALE. That will be better still. I will modify it so as to read:

That no part of the fund allotted to any State or Territory under the provisions of the first section of this act shall be used, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. The other fund is explicitly named the "school-house fund."

Mr. HALE. Still it would in general terms be an educational fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the amendment to section 9 reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 9 so as to make it read:

That no part of the fund allotted to any State or Territory under the provisions of the first section of this act shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. HALE. The last words "except as hereinafter provided" do not need to be in now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The first words after "Territory" cover it all, and the last would reverse the whole effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last words will be omitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Stop at the word "same" and strike out the words "except as hereinafter provided."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been already done. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS. In Louisiana we have no counties. The political subdivisions of the State are called parishes. Therefore I move to insert the words "or parish" after county wherever the word "county" is mentioned in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. There is one other place in the bill where, by an amendment, the phrase "the age of children between ten and twenty-one" is used. I do not remember the place.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in the second section, placed there by the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that by adding the words "both inclusive," so that it will include the years of ten and twenty-one.

Mr. INGALLS. It is in section 2, line 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 13, after the word "years," where it occurs the second time, it is moved to insert the words "both inclusive;" so as to read:

Between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years, both inclusive, in such State or Territory bear to each other, as shown by the said census.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I wish to reserve all amendments made to section 2 from any general vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the vote be taken in gross?

Mr. MAXEY. I ask a separate vote on the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] that if a State declines to receive the money its amount shall pass over to the other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be noted. Are there any other amendments excepted?

Mr. HALE. All amendments to section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be reserved.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire a separate vote on the amendment which struck out one of the sections—I have forgotten which—declaring the purpose of the bill not to interfere with the educational systems of the States.

Mr. JACKSON. That is in the seventh section.

Mr. BLAIR. It was struck out on motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. I have not the original print here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi will be reserved.

Mr. CALL. I ask a separate vote on the amendment I offered to section 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Florida will have to be reoffered. It was not adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. I simply give notice that I shall offer it at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments not reserved.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reserved amendments will now be reported in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of section 2 of the original bill, after the word "Territories," the words "and in the District of Columbia" were inserted.

Mr. HALE. That is not what I am after. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next reserved amendment was at the end of line 7 of section 2, after "1880," to insert:

Until the illiteracy returns of the census returns of 1890 shall be received, and then upon the basis of that census.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to that.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next reserved amendment was to insert after the amendment just adopted:

And in each State and Territory in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money received in such State or Territory shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools respectively in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years, both inclusive, in such State or Territory bear to each other, as shown by the said census. The foregoing provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein no distinction of race or color shall exist.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senator proceeds, one verbal amendment was made, which the Chief Clerk has not read, at the commencement of this matter which the Senator may desire to have struck out. After the word "Territories" the words "and the District of Columbia" were inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. It was not read in the line to which I refer, line 8. There are separate schools in the District of Columbia as well as in States and Territories. In line 8, after the words "in each State and Territory," the words "and the District of Columbia" were inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words were not inserted according to the record kept by the clerks.

Mr. BLAIR. The motion was made and put, as I understood. If not, those words had better be inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They should go in lines 10 and 13 as well if they are to go in in line 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words were not actually inserted on any motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There will be no objection to inserting them.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out after the words "census of 1880," in line 7 of section 2, all that follows to and including the word "census," in line 14, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

That is the Allison amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is that amendment in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole must be voted on first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is an amendment to an amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Then I move to add to the Senator's amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This being an amendment in the second degree, it is not open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to discuss it. The hour is late. Everybody understands that it involves the exact principle brought forward by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], upon which there has been no test vote in the Senate. I desire a test vote upon that. It may control my vote upon the bill. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please send the amendment to the desk that it may be read.

The amendment was sent to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "census of 1880," in line 7, as follows:

And in each State and Territory and in the District of Columbia in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money received in such State or Territory and in the District of Columbia shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools respectively in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten years and twenty-one years in such State or Territory and the District of Columbia bear to each other, as shown by the said census.

And insert in lieu thereof:

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] upon this amendment. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Chace,	Ingalls,	Manderson,	Van Wyck,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Frye,	Logan,	Sherman,
Hale,	Mahone,	Teller,

NAYS—37.

ABSENT—25.

Butler,	Gray,	Morgan,	Vest.
Camden,	Harrison,	Pike,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Platt,
Cockrell,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that the same amendment which has been put in other places where "ten and twenty-one years" occur, "both inclusive," may be inserted here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has already been done.

Mr. CONGER. In the first place?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; in this amendment to section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those words have been inserted.

Mr. CONGER. That is right; but they were not read as being in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want in the next clause of this amendment, which is not yet agreed to, in line 17, to change the phraseology. It has been suggested that it was possible that a misconstruction could be put upon the words "common schools wherein no distinction of race or color shall exist," that it would be possible still to make a discrimination in a way which has been stated to me, which I do not see myself, but to guard against any such possibility I move to strike out the words "no distinction of race or color shall exist" and insert "white and colored children are taught together;" so as to read:

The foregoing provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein white and colored children are taught together.

As I say, I do not see the necessity of it myself, but to guard against that apprehension I move to change the words in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, in line 17, the words "no distinction of race or color shall exist" and insert in lieu thereof "white and colored children are taught together;" so as to read:

The foregoing provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein white and colored children are taught together.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest, and move in fact, as a matter of some convenience in executing this law, in line 18, to strike out the word "provided" and insert what follows, from line 18 to line 27, as a section, because it is a distinct matter in itself and has no relation to the particular question of white and colored schools. It is section 2, page 3, line 18 to line 27, inclusive. It is a topic about the District of Alaska, which has no relation as a proviso to what precedes it. I therefore move to strike out the word "provided," and make that clause, from lines 18 to 27, inclusive, a separate section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be considered as agreed to. The proviso will be made a separate section.

Mr. BLAIR. Let it be understood that the Secretary shall number the sections consecutively.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a regulation of the rules without any special vote.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment has not yet been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved amendment will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next reserved amendment was to insert at the end of the first proviso to section 1:

And if any State, by its Legislature, shall decline or relinquish its share or proportion under this act, or any portion thereof, the sum so relinquished shall go to increase the amount for distribution among the other States and the Territories as herein provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. MAXEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. STANFORD], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote for this amendment; so I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired on this bill and all amendments to it with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I refrain from voting.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], but upon this question I have transferred the pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Berry,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Blair,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Frye,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sherman,
Call,	George,	Mitchell of Oregon,	Vance,
Chace,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Voorhees,

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to know where that amendment comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the end of the first proviso to section 1. The next reserved amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4 of the original bill, in section 7, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out all down to and including the word "provided," in line 6, and inserted "that." The words stricken out are:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided.

Mr. GEORGE. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole striking out that clause. Those who are in favor of striking that out will vote "yea," and those who are opposed to striking that out will vote "nay." Is that the state of the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. GEORGE. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce again my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 0, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—0.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments have been disposed of. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The last vote leaves the words to stand in the bill, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words stand in the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The RECORD since this debate began has been made so much the vehicle of everything uttered on this question by newspapers and by others that I ask the Secretary to read an extract from the New York Evening Post of February 27 last, which contains an extract from the last report of the superintendent of education for South Carolina, which records a fact which, if this bill shall become a law, I have no doubt will prove to be profitable. I ask the Secretary to read the extract which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

As a matter of fact, the mere passage of the Blair bill through one branch of Congress——

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator offer that as part of his remarks or is it put in as a paper?

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. Let us hear it.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from New Hampshire prefers I will read it myself.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator puts it in as part of his remarks I do not want to object; but it is very easy to keep us here a long time by reading newspapers.

Mr. PLUMB. After the manner in which the Senator himself was indulged in regard to a whole number of the RECORD, I regard that as being rather impudent on the whole.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD, as my remarks were to save time.

Mr. PLUMB. I asked that it be read at the desk. If the Senator objects, I will read it myself.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object to its being read if the Senator wants to make it part of his speech.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Secretary will return it to me I will read it myself.

Mr. COCKRELL. It could have been read in the time that has been consumed by the Senator from New Hampshire in talking about it.

Mr. PLUMB. The article is as follows; and, for fear the Senator from New Hampshire may not have heard my prefatory remarks, I will say that it was published in the New York Evening Post of February 27 last:

As a matter of fact, the mere passage of the Blair bill through one branch of Congress two years ago, with the promise of its becoming a law, had the effect to hinder the progress of the public-school system in South Carolina. In his annual report submitted to the Legislature in December, 1884, eight months after the Senate passed the Blair bill, Mr. Asbury Coward, superintendent of public education, said that the year just closed had been marked by several circumstances which operated adversely to the advancement of educational affairs, and we call the especial attention of every thoughtful person to the circumstance which he cites as last and most important:

"The short and unremunerative crops of 1883, the severity and inclemency of the weather last winter, the delay and difficulty experienced in planting the crops of the current year, the unusual stringency in the circulation of money, which has cramped so generally the business interests of our people, all tended to hinder the work of the public schools. In addition to these drawbacks, the discussion of the policy of Federal aid for the suppression of illiteracy revived into active expression all the latent or hitherto silent opposition to the common-school system of the State."

That is the end of the quotation. What follows is the comment of the editor:

We do not believe that upon more careful reflection any candid journal will longer support a measure the mere discussion of which, by the testimony of the superintendent of education in South Carolina, has already injured the cause of education in the South.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the name of the superintendent?

Mr. PLUMB. Asbury Coward. I will read also, as the Senator from New Hampshire desires that I shall, from the New York Evening Post of the 1st of March.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. I decline to be interrupted. I read from the New York Evening Post of the 1st day of the present month the following from an editorial article under the title of "Impressive warnings."

Mr. HARRISON. What was the title?

Mr. PLUMB. "Impressive warnings." After going on to recite the quotation I have just read, the article proceeds:

To careful observers of Georgia's wonderful material progress during the last few years it has been a mystery that so prosperous a Commonwealth did not do more to make her school system worthy of "the Empire State of the South." We have at last discovered the reason. It has been simply because her people had concluded that they were soon going to get liberal appropriations for this purpose from Washington, and consequently did not need to make greater efforts themselves to meet the necessities of the case. So long ago as November, 1882, Mr. Gustavus J. Orr, the State school commissioner, in his report to the Legislature, condemned "the utter inadequacy of the sums which we are applying to the support of schools to the object to be accomplished;" pointed out "the urgent necessity of more liberal appropriations for school;" showed that a tax of only one-fifth of 1 per cent. upon the property of the State would keep the schools in operation six months, nearly twice the period that they were then open, met the former plea of poverty by the declaration that "the time has come when we can do better," and concluded:

"I am sure that we have reached a point where we can continue our schools in operation for six months [nearly twice the period at that time] without unduly burdening the people."

The Legislature failed to act upon Mr. Orr's recommendation. Why? The answer to this question is given in the following letter to the Evening Post from Mr. Woodrow Wilson, author of the work on Congressional government, which has attracted so much attention, a native of the South, who stoutly opposes the Blair bill, as do so many of the most clear-sighted Southerners:

In the winter of 1882-'83 I spent some time in Atlanta, Ga., while the Legislature was in session. The project of Federal aid to education was already then being pushed. One day I dropped into the gallery of the State senate chamber for an hour, and chanced to find a discussion in progress upon a proposal to increase the appropriation for education, as Mr. Orr had urged that the State was so abundantly able to do. Only a small minority favored the measure for heavier taxation. The majority supported a counter-resolution that the Senators and Representatives of the State in Congress be requested to do all in their power to secure the passage of a law giving aid from the Federal Treasury to education in the States.

I heard one speech made in opposition to this begging resolution. It was a sturdy appeal to the self-respect and independence of Georgians, in view of what the speaker treated as the unquestioned ability of the State to support a school system worthy of so great and prosperous a Commonwealth. No attempt was made by the majority to answer his argument, which, like Mr. Orr's plea, was indeed unanswerable. The majority kept silence and contented themselves with passing the resolution appealing for outside help to do what by their very silence they confessed they were able to do themselves. It was evident that no increase in the State appropriation for public education would be voted so long as there was the least prospect of aid from Washington. The whole performance impressed me as a shameless declaration, upon the part of a well-to-do community, of its deliberate determination to enjoy the easy position of a beneficiary of the National Government to the fullest possible extent, rather than to be independent and support a good school system by its own unaided efforts.

There is more to the same effect. It has been widely assumed that all the educators, at least all the professional educators of this country, were in favor of national aid to education. I have in my hand a letter from one of the leading educators of the West, in fact of the entire country, a man well known in public affairs, who is a professor in the State University of Kansas, written on the 27th day of February, from which I will quote one or two paragraphs as showing his position:

I am thoroughly in accord with your position on the Blair educational bill. This has been my position from the first. I can not see how the scheme can be made to work without almost unlimited friction between State and national authorities. Nor can I see any practical limit to the frauds which would surely grow up under its administration. But above all, I deem the whole scheme unconstitutional. We have stretched the general-welfare clause till its real meaning has been almost forgotten. Such juggling with words and their meanings and such "interpretations" will surely bear a full crop of disasters. I am in favor of the nation with a big N, and I assert, and that constantly, that as we turn toward nationalism we are strong, and as we go toward sectionalism or individualism we are weak. But we are not yet through with local government, nor are we ready to abolish State Legislatures. We do not want this country turned into a bureaucracy. The whole policy of the central Government—toward States and individuals—should be to help them help themselves. Protection in life, liberty, and property is about all the protection that a self-respecting State or citizen will ask.

* * * * * * *

The best thing about education is the desire to get it. That is what makes life as an instructor in the Kansas State University so enjoyable. If the time ever comes that boys are sent here instead of young men coming here, I shall emigrate.

If it were not for the late hour there are some other things I should like to call the attention of the Senate to in the same direction, but with the hope that we may have a vote on this bill I will say no more.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that Mr. Coward, the superintendent of South Carolina, certainly must be misrepresented in the article read from the New York Evening Post, which has long been interesting itself for the defeat of this bill. I do not know its motive or the motives of those who make use of its columns. Mr. Coward was one of the superintendents of education, and he appeared in company with a committee of some twelve or fifteen of them before the Committee on Education and Labor and gave his testimony as to the condition of his State and his knowledge of the other Southern States, strongly urging the enactment of this very law; and although he may have perhaps—though I have never seen it—dropped an expression that the delay in furnishing this money as soon as it was hoped it might be received has exerted a depressing effect upon many of those who hoped to receive its benefits earlier, still there can be no stronger expression, in my belief, attributed to Mr. Coward, and he still desires this aid. He understands that his State needs it. Of that I have not the slightest doubt.

In regard to the expression from the gentleman in Kansas, I have nothing further to say than that I have received from his own State many letters from members of the Legislature of the State and prominent business men, in which they assert that the sentiment of Kansas is in favor of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment, at the end of section 10 to add the following:

That nothing in this section shall prevent any State or Territory from applying the money provided in this act to industrial education as a part of its common-school system of education.

I will not delay the Senate; I merely wish to read an extract from the report of the royal commissioners to the Parliament of Great Britain on technical instruction. They say:

Intelligent youths of the artisan classes should have easy access to secondary and technical schools by numerous scholarships, and the more promising students of them again to the higher technical colleges.

For the great mass of our working population, who must necessarily begin to earn their livelihood at an early age, and from whom our foremen will be mostly selected, it is essential that instruction in the rudiments of the sciences bearing upon industry should form a part of the curriculum of the elementary schools, and that instruction in drawing, and more especially in drawing with rule and compass, of a character likely to be useful to them in their future occupations as workmen and artisans, should receive far greater attention than it does at present. The importance of the first of these subjects has so far been acknowledged by the education department that in all infant schools simple lessons on objects and the more commonly occurring phenomena of nature have been made obligatory. This system of instruction, if properly illustrated by the exhibition of the object itself, or of diagrams or models of the same, or by the simplest kinds of experiments, is an excellent foundation for the subsequent teaching of elementary science.

* * * * * * *

In the evening schools of North Germany (Fortbildungs-schulen) the studies of the ordinary elementary school are continued, the further instruction being confined mainly to book-keeping and rudimentary mathematics, with some notions of natural philosophy. In the evening schools of the same class in South Germany the instruction given is of a more technical character than in the north.

For instruction in drawing, as applied mainly to decorative work in France, and to both constructive and decorative work in Belgium, the opportunities are excellent. The crowded schools of drawing, modeling, carving, and painting, maintained at the expense of the municipalities of Paris, Lyons, Brussels, and other cities—absolutely gratuitous, and open to all comers, well lighted, furnished with the best models, and under the care of teachers full of enthusiasm—stimulate those manufactures and crafts in which the fine arts play a prominent part to a degree which is without parallel in this country. Instruction in art applied to industry and decoration is now pursued with energy in South Germany and in several of the northern Italian towns, and the influence of this instruction on the employment of the people is becoming very conspicuous in those countries. The government schools of applied art in France, under the decree of 1881, of which the Limoges Decorative Arts School is the earliest example, and which, like the above-mentioned schools, are gratuitous, should be mentioned in this connection.

The technical lectures and classes to which we have referred are in nearly all continental states held not only in the evening, but also, and in some branches, as in weaving, principally, on Sundays; and all the great museums and collections are open on Sundays. No one who has seen the crowds of orderly artisans with their families visit the splendid collections of the Louvre and Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers on a Sunday can have failed to reflect on the powerful educational influence thus brought to bear on that important class of the population.

Home and village industries have been in some cases initiated, in others improved and extended, in districts where, from the poverty of the population and the scarcity of capital, special aids were essential, notably in Baden, Bavaria, and the Tyrol. In the schools established and maintained for this purpose, wood carving, and inlaying, clock-making, filagree work, basket-making, and other simple trades, for which there were local materials and aptitude, have been taught with considerable success. In some cases these industries have been so firmly and permanently established as to render unnecessary the further maintenance of the special schools. In the primary schools of the Black Forest straw-plaiting is taught to girls. Discriminating regard is paid to the capabilities of each sex. In "women's work" schools on the Reutlingen model, and in the professional schools for girls which have been established in France and the Netherlands, instruction is successfully given, qualifying girls for many useful occupations, though these are scarcely of the kind usually understood under the term of manufactures.

I merely wish to say that while the Senate refuses to adopt this amendment, commending, as it must, the object of elementary and permanent school instruction, the Parliament of Great Britain, the royal commissioners in a monarchical government, have recognized its necessity and prescribed it as a rule for all the primary schools in Great Britain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LOGAN, Mr. CONGER, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired on all questions connected with this bill with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). On this bill I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). Upon the passage of this bill I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and I suppose he would vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). Upon the passage of this bill, as I have already stated, I am paired with my colleague [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired upon this question with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and I understand he would vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). Upon the passage of this bill I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is detained from the Senate by illness. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. PIKE's name was called). I am informed that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. I am not informed how either would vote.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] if present, would vote "yea." I do not know how the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] would vote.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from New Jersey would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] on this bill. If he were present, I should vote "nay" and I understand he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] requested me yesterday, when he left the Chamber unwell, to state, when his name was called, that he was paired with some Senator, I forget whom. The Senator from Maryland would vote against the bill if here.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I was asked to pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], which I did on two votes, but I understand he is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired on this bill with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 11; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill be printed for the use of the Senate as passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the bill be printed as it has passed.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 217, being resolutions reported by the Committee on the Judicary on the subject of papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 217, being resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, 1886, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send to the Senate copies of certain papers.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont. Is that likely to continue until finally disposed of, or will it be subject to intermissions?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope it will continue and be disposed of in two or three days at the most.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that question for the reason there are matters on the Calendar which ought to be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not ask to take up this subject until the end of the morning hour, at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up the Presidential count bill, which had precedence on the Calendar both of the measure just passed and of the measure now taken up, either by devoting a half hour to it before 2 o'clock or by laying this aside informally with the consent of the Senate. I think it can be disposed of in twenty or thirty minutes.

ACCOUNTS WITH UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to introduce a resolution of inquiry, to be followed by a bill which I shall ask to have referred to the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what, if any, amount of money has been expended by the United States in behalf of the Territory of Utah since the passage of the act of Congress of June 23, 1874, entitled "An act in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah," and if any such money has been so expended whether the United States has been reimbursed therefor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1791) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia H. Totten; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1792) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold compensation to the members and officers of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah until the United States has been reimbursed for certain expenditures on account of said Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask leave to submit a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Forth Smith, Ark., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1.

WM. MAHONE,
JNO. C. SPOONER,
J. H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
BARCLAY HENLEY,
W. H. WARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

FORFEITURE OF IOWA LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that on Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 30, being the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Talbert be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAXEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I give notice that on Monday, at the earliest practicable moment, I shall move the consideration of the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ZACH MONTGOMERY.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. Before that motion is pressed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. I wish just a moment.

Mr. COKE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAIR. During the progress of the discussion upon the school bill, which has just passed, a violent attack was made upon Mr. Zach Montgomery, as will be remembered, and I concurred in the sentiments that were expressed against him, assuming that the statements which were read upon the floor of the Senate represented truly his sentiments. He has since sent me a disclaimer, and knowing no reason to believe him to be other than an honorable gentleman, and being desirous if I have myself done him an injury to repair that injury, I ask that this statement which he has sent me be printed, so that as much publicity be given to his justification as has been to the attack upon him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the paper?

Mr. BLAIR. It is a paper which Mr. Montgomery sends me which was originally published in the New York Tribune, in which he denies what he alleges to have been a misrepresentation of his sentiments as expressed in 1873. It is very brief and I think in justice to the gentleman it ought to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. If we are going to discuss Mr. Zach Montgomery I have some additional papers and evidence that I wish to present to-night.

Mr. COKE. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the resolutions taken up on motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], which are now the unfinished business, the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 5, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by theChaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AMERICAN COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FORD], from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3426) to incorporate the American College for the Blind. I ask that this bill, with the adverse report, be placed on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There being no objection, the bill, with the adverse report, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I asked leave on yesterday to extend my remarks in the RECORD; but I am not sure whether the permission was granted or not.

The SPEAKER. It was objected to by a number of gentlemen.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I ask leave now that that privilege be accorded me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The RECORD shows, Mr. Speaker, that the objection to the gentleman's request was finally withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair understood that a number of gentlemen had objected. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] withdrew his objection, but the Chair had no intimation that other gentlemen withdrew theirs. The Chair will now submit the gentleman's request to the House for unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pension appropriation bill in the RECORD. Is there any objection?

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], as he suggested last evening, does not intend to incorporate any affidavits which have not been read upon the floor of the House, there will be no objection. He intimated that he had other affidavits; if he intends to incorporate others, objection will be made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall only desire to incorporate those to which I have alluded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

SALARIES OF POSTAL RAILWAY CLERKS, CLASS 4.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information concerning the application of the sum appropriated for the current fiscal year to pay $1,200 and $1,400 salaries to railway postal clerks of class 4; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEHLBACH indefinitely, on account of sickness.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations and put the same upon its passage. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, for a statement in regard to the importance of the matter.

The SPEAKER. Consent must first be given by the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that, Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to state simply that the object of this is to reprint the Postal Laws and Regulations, which publication is now exhausted. There is to be a revision also; but it is provided that no extra charge is to be made for that purpose. The last report was made in 1879, and the supply is now entirely exhausted. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads could do no better than to borrow four or five copies of the Postmaster-General for use in the committee. There are none to be distributed to postmasters throughout the country, and none to members of the House or the Senate who may make application for them. The Postmaster-General is exceedingly anxious to have this reprint made, and its importance must commend itself to the House. I trust there will be no objection whatever to the request.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for printing and publishing a new edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department there is appropriated ——— thousand dollars; such edition to be prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and printed at the Government Printing Office. No extra compensation shall be allowed to any officer or clerk of the Department for services in preparing or superintending the publication of such edition. The Postmaster-General may authorize the sale of copies of such edition, not needed for the use of the Department, to individuals, at the cost thereof; the proceeds of such sales to be deposited in the Treasury as part of the postal revenues.

The committee recommend the following amendments:

Fill the blank in the fourth line by adding "consisting of 7,500 copies;" also in line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert "17;" and in line 6, after the word "thousand," insert "four hundred and seventy-five;" also in line 14, after the word "thereof," add "with 10 per cent. added;" so that the bill as amended will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That for printing and publishing a new edition of the Laws and Regulations of the Post-Office Department, consisting of 7,500 copies, there is appropriated $17,475; such edition to be prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and printed at the Government Printing Office. No extra compensation shall be allowed to any officer or clerk of the Department for services in preparing or superintending the publication of such edition. The Postmaster-General may authorize the sale of copies of such edition, not needed for the use of the Department, to individuals, at the cost thereof, with 10 per cent. added; the proceeds of such sales to be deposited in the Treasury as part of the postal revenues."

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if this provides for any number to be distributed among members of the House or Senate.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. It does not. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that it has been usual for the Postmaster-General to furnish members on their requisition or request with copies.

Mr. DUNHAM. It seems to me that it would be just as well to incorporate that provision in the bill itself, providing that a number of copies should be distributed among members of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not this private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then I object.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is absolutely necessary to have this reprint. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUCHANAN. How long will it take?

Mr. BURROWS. But a very few minutes.

Mr. PETERS. There will be no debate.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Unless a separate vote is demanded the amendments will be considered as agreed to.

No separate vote being demanded, the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to offer an amendment with the object of having copies of this work furnished to members of the House. I ask the committee to accept that amendment. This ought to be a document for public distribution by members of Congress. I therefore move as an amendment to insert a proviso that each member of the House shall be furnished with twenty-five copies.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend from Illinois will not delay this matter by urging that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend the resolution so as to provide that there shall be printed for distribution by members of the House twenty-five copies to each member.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia who has charge of this matter whether the printing of this postal guide is to be opened to public competition as to its compilation and printing.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand this appropriation is placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General for the purpose of having the work printed. There is no restriction as to the mode in which it shall be done. I presume it will be printed, however, by the Public Printer.

The estimate has been made by the Public Printer, supervised by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw any objection my language might have implied. I supposed this bill related to the Postal Guide.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Oh, no.

Mr. RANDALL. I will have something to say about that when it comes up.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is a compilation of the postal laws and regulations.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if this will be immediately available?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Yes, sir; that is my purpose in calling up the bill for consideration at this time.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call the standing and select committees of the House for reports on bills of a private nature.

SILAS JAMES.

Mr. WINANS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2793) granting a pension to Silas James; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIJAH W. PUTNEY.

Mr. WINANS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4346) granting a pension to Elijah W. Putney; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. SCHUYLER SUTTON.

Mr. ELLSBERRY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1937) for increase of pension to A. Schuyler Sutton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH WARNER.

Mr. ELLSBERRY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5729) granting a pension to Elizabeth Warner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. H. H. GILLESPIE.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1344) granting a pension to William H. H. Gillespie; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES B. RUSSELL.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B. Russell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 5694) for the relief of Jennie Huggins; and

A bill (H. R. 5617) granting a pension to Henry Domeyer.

HENRY BARR.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2179) granting a pension to Henry Barr; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 2063) granting a pension to Mary Kerr;

A bill (H. K. 5178) for the relief of Annie L. Langworthy; and

A bill (H. R. 2071) granting a pension to Charles F. Eilber.

MARY MERRILL.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4631) granting a pension to Mary Merrill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROXANA V. RILEY & SON.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 5306) granting a pension to Roxana V. Riley & Son; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DARIUS M. SEAMAN.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1279) granting a pension to Darius M. Seaman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIJAH P. HENSLEY.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1707) granting a pension to Elijah P. Hensley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES N. HAIR.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4977) granting a pension to James N. Hair; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 1251) granting an increase of pension to Edward Pendergast;

A bill (H. R. 4634) for the relief of Lewis M. Sparks; and

A bill (H. R. 5674) granting a pension to Abbott B. J. Bent.

CHARLES WYANT.

Mr. PINDAR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5705) granting a pension to Charles Wyant; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARGARET A. JACOB.

Mr. PINDAR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5021) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Jacob; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH PROST.

Mr. PIDCOCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5307) granting a pension to Lieut. Joseph Prost; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH CROWLEY.

Mr. PIDCOCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5332) granting a pension to Elizabeth Crowley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. R. SHIPLEY.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5691) for the relief of E. R. Shipley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES ALBERT BONSACK.

Mr. COWLES, from the Committee on Patents, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2950) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House of the Forty-seventh Congress, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William H. Richardson.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the urgency deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCCREARY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the urgency deficiency appropriation bill, the Clerk will report the bill by its title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies of the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, it will not be unprofitable, perhaps, to state to the committee that this is the urgency deficiency bill, consisting of eight items. It is not the regular deficiency bill, which is now in course of preparation, and which will contain all the deficiencies estimated for by the Departments and found by the committee lawful subjects of appropriations in its judgment. I mention this fact for the reason that we have been compelled to go over the estimated deficiencies and select such as seemed to demand immediate attention. No items of deficiency not included in this bill are passed upon either favorably or unfavorably by our action on this urgent bill. Other items submitted to the Committee on Appropriations will be passed upon and presented in the regular deficiency bill, which I trust will be reported in the course of three or four weeks.

As I have already stated, Mr. Chairman, this bill contains eight general items; and I will call the attention of the committee to them severally. First is an item of $589.65, "compensation of special agents of the independent treasury." We are advised by the Treasurer of the United States that in consequence of a defalcation which occurred last summer in the subtreasury at New Orleans it was necessary at considerably increased expense to proceed immediately to an investigation, which was special and extraordinary, in consequence of which this deficiency accrued upon the appropriation as of last year. This is a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

"Compensation for special agents of the Treasury for the examination of the remaining subtreasuries" is asked for to the extent of $4,000. This is an estimated deficiency. The appropriation for the current year is now exhausted, and out of the nine subtreasuries there remain to be examined the subtreasuries at Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and Baltimore. These examinations are necessarily more expensive than they have been heretofore. We all understand that in consequence of a complete change, or a change more or less complete, in the administration of the different Departments of the Government it has been necessary to be a little more careful and particular in these first examinations than perhaps will ordinarily be considered necessary. In addition to this, we are advised by the Treasury Department that a very large amount of silver has accumulated in the subtreasury, which makes the count more laborious and expensive. At all events, in consequence of these things, it is estimated that a deficiency appropriation of $4,000 will be required to enable the Treasurer of the United States to make such examination as the law requires to be made of the subtreasuries of the country.

Perhaps I ought to say also that the labor of these examinations is usually performed by clerks already in the service of the Treasury Department. It is performed now mainly by them; but because the law requires also the examination of the books and accounts of the subtreasury and the manner of keeping the money therein, it sometimes becomes necessary to employ expert accountants and also expert counters to assist them. The appropriation for this deficiency seems to be a necessity. At all events the appropriation already made is exhausted, and three subtreasuries remain unexamined. With great confidence in the Treasurer of the United States, the committee has yielded largely to his judgment.

The third item is "for repairs of the Treasury building in Washington." For repairing of the roof of this building last year, which had become greatly injured, $6,400 of extraordinary expenses were incurred, leaving but $8,600 for usual expenses, uniformly estimated at $15,000. We are now advised by competent practical mechanics that there are leaks in the roof; that extensive repairs to the building, inside and out, are a necessity; and that an appropriation now for these repairs may save an increased expenditure, and therefore an increased appropriation, which will be necessary if the work be delayed.

The next item is with regard to the propagation of codfish in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico, $12,000. This, we may say, is a matter of experiment; but we have the judgment, experience, and integrity of the Fish Commissioner to guide us. In past years we have placed, as we now place, implicit confidence as well in the intelligence as in the integrity of the Commissioner; and I am proud to say that, so far as I know or have heard any expression of opinion, that confidence has been appropriately placed. At all events he has commenced the transportation of codfish, with a firm and fixed belief that they can be made to prosper in the Gulf of Mexico. Of course we understand that they are a valuable food-fish. Already the work has been commenced. It must cease unless this urgent appropriation is made, for the reason that whatever may be done must be done between now and the 1st or 15th of April at the latest. The question is simply then whether you will go on and finish the work commenced, of giving to the Gulf of Mexico and the waters flowing into it the benefit of this great food-fish. Your committee have been of opinion—I believe without controversy or dissent—that the work auspiciously begun should be carried on to completion.

The next item is for artificial limbs to wounded soldiers. I might in this connection profitably call the attention of the appropriate committee to the fact that the laws with reference to this subject need amendment. In my judgment, and in the judgment I doubt not of many others who have examined the matter, abuses have crept or are likely to creep into this service. We find, strange to say, that although the war has been over for twenty years, the list of recipients of this provision for the wounded soldiers has greatly increased—from 6,000 in 1870 to nearly 19,000—and within the last quinquennial period the increase has been from 16,000 to nearly 19,000.

It is not my purpose, however, to do anything more than call attention to these laws. We propose to appropriate under the law as we find it. We find that already nearly five hundred applicants for either artificial limbs or for commutation allowed under the laws have not been supplied with the one or the other, as they have a just right to be; and the failure has been for want of money. The appropriation is exhausted. Five hundred applicants are clamoring for what is due them, and they need it. We ask an appropriation in this bill of $175,000 for the remainder of the fiscal year. We have been advised that probably $200,000 will be required for this service, but upon a careful estimate I believe the committee unanimously agreed that $175,000 will meet the requirements of all the soldiers entitled either to artificial limbs or to commutation therefor. We have therefore reported an appropriation of that amount.

I next call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the items of appropriation with regard to the jurors' fund and witnesses' fund in the United States courts. The fund for witnesses is exhausted. That for jurors has been reduced during the last month from $60,000 to about $29,000, the amount now on hand. It will be perceived therefore, that if from January 30 to February 28 the expenditure for jurors was nearly or quite $30,000, the courts, now beginning their spring terms everywhere over the country, will necessarily expend more than $30,000 a month; so that by the close of the present month there will be no money in the jurors' fund. In consequence of this condition of affairs we have been asked to make, and in this bill have reported, an appropriation for $50,000, which we trust will be sufficient for the remainder of the current year.

Mr. HISCOCK. How much was the appropriation for the year?

Mr. BURNES. The appropriation was $400,000. The estimate last year was $450,000.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BURNES. I thank my colleague on the committee; I should have said the estimate was $500,000, and the appropriation $450,000

Mr. HISCOCK. Then you have in this bill given the amount really estimated for.

Mr. BURNES. Just the $50,000 included in the estimate of last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there any explanation why it was not appropriated for last year?

Mr. BURNES. I will say to my friend from New York but for the extraordinary expenses attending the execution of the laws in certain portions of the country, notably, I may say, in the Territory of Utah, this deficiency would not have occurred. I believe the appropriation was amply sufficient for the ordinary service of the courts of the country, but as my friend from New York knows we have had extraordinary expenses in several places, and especially, as I have already stated, in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point I desire to make, if the gentleman will pardon me, is that now the amount estimated for is the amount you really intend to give.

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir; the effect is to give the amount estimated for last year.

We have also reported, Mr. Chairman, an appropriation of $135,000 for witness fees in the United States courts. This, I regret to say, is an increase over the estimates of last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. How much did you appropriate last year?

Mr. BURNES. For the current year, $550,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. You cut down the estimates how much?

Mr. BURNES. Sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no; you cut it down $100,000.

Mr. BURNES. Excuse me, the estimate was for $610,000. We cut it down $60,000, making it $550,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thought you cut it down $100,000.

Mr. BURNES. No, sir; I will give the gentleman the figures. The estimate was $610,000, and the appropriation was $550,000. The appropriation for 1885 was $600,000. The ascertained deficiency, which we have not put into this bill, because it was not regarded as urgent, is $15,000. So the appropriation for 1885 of $600,000, with the ascertained deficiency of $15,000, my friend from New York will perceive, will amount in all to $615,000 as the amount expended. If this bill should pass with this item in it it would be $685,000 for the current year, as against $615,000 for the preceding year.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as this item is concerned, then, this bill vindicates the good judgment of the officer who made the estimate for the service for this year.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I have been so accustomed in the transaction of purely business matters, whether of a public or a private character, to look alone to just business principles and considerations that I am almost untutored in the art of looking beyond them for political influences or party advantages. I will say, however, to my distinguished friend from New York, with all the great respect so justly due him, that the deficiency in this case is caused by an abnormal state of things—I had almost said by abnormal proceedings—in the courts of the Territory of Utah. There has been an increase of expenses extraordinary in the courts of Utah, and I may say unexpected, that no wisdom could have foreseen and provided against, whether that wisdom was in the head of a Republican or in the head of a Democrat. But for these extraordinary expenses the appropriation for the current year would have been ample, in my humble judgment, for this service, but in consequence of these extraordinary expenses incurred in pursuing existing laws with reference to that Territory we have been compelled to provide for this deficiency, as estimated by the Department of Justice.

Mr. Chairman, I come next to the consideration of the remaining item in this urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and I beg gentlemen to believe that if I say anything that is not strictly in accordance with the necessities of a business consideration of any proposition I do not intend it. At the same time I have necessarily to allude to gentlemen high in the Navy Department.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose the gentleman has the item before him, and I would like to know what was the estimate last year in regard to artificial limbs?

Mr. BURNES. In regard to the artificial limbs the estimate was $550,000 and the appropriation $400,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. You cut down the estimate $100,000.

Mr. BURNES. Let me recall to the gentleman's recollection the remark made by me when I first took the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. You have here exceeded the estimate $25,000.

Mr. BURNES. I understand the drift of the gentleman's inquiry. Let us be fair to each other.

As I stated in my opening, and as I doubt not every fair-minded man on the floor will admit, we were surprised that instead of an anticipated decrease in the expense under the beneficent laws for the limbless soldiers of the country there has been a substantial and unexpected increase of 20 per cent. in the last five years. Considering the fact that deaths must be numerous, and that twenty-one years have elapsed since the close of the war, we could see no reason in committee and I can see none now for an increase in the number of gentlemen who should have the relief that is afforded by this item of appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague yield to me here?

Mr. BURNES. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call attention to the fact that a reason for this was given by the officials of the Surgeon-General's Office to this effect: Some gentlemen on that side, either of the House or of the Senate, a year or two ago were very anxious, and I do not say improperly so, to have the lists of pensioners published to the country, and they were published in four or five volumes. I think it was a proposition which was advocated at great length by the then and now Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], and the publication of that list has given the claim agents throughout the country the names of these men, and they have flooded the country with suggestions that the pensioners were entitled to artificial limbs or commutation therefor, and many of them are now for the first time making application; and that is about the only good I have ever heard resulting from the publication of these four or five volumes.

Mr. BURNES. I have no question with my friend and colleague on the committee as to the matter of which he spoke. I have no doubt that his statement is founded on due and proper investigation and inquiry as to that branch of the subject. But I have not found it necessary to inquire into that matter. Whatever was the result of legislation upon the subject mentioned by my distinguished friend and colleague on the committee, it will not now be discussed by me. But I can add justifiably that the distinguished and able Senator from Kentucky who has been alluded to has done so much of valuable legislation for the country he can well afford to make now and then a mistake, if he has made any.

Now, Mr. Chairman, passing from these items, let us approach the consideration of another question as Representatives of a business people.

On the 20th day of December, 1882, during, I believe, the Forty-seventh Congress, the naval advisory board having been called upon to sit in judgment upon the propriety of building four new steel cruisers, made an official report to this House and to Congress, not only in favor of building these four cruisers, but adjudging the cost and fixing a limit thereto. They estimated that the four would cost, and ought to cost, $4,099,304; that is to say $1,576,854 for the Chicago, $1,031,225 for the Boston, a like sum for the Atlanta, and $460,000 for the Dolphin.

Subsequently, on January 15, 1883, the same board made what they called a "corrected estimate" with regard to the cost of the Chicago, the largest of the four vessels, and by this "corrected estimate" the cost of the four vessels was decreased to the extent of $77,770. I shall take no further notice of this "corrected estimate," for the reason that perhaps after all it has no bearing on any question necessarily involved by this bill.

On the 3d of March, 1883, at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress, what was called the "Robeson act" was passed into a law. That act contained these words:

> And the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels—
> Meaning the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and the Dolphin—
> and procure their armament at a total cost for each of the same not exceeding the amount estimated by the naval advisory board.

By this same act $1,300,000 were appropriated in gross for the commencement and prosecution of the work. Subsequently, on July 7, 1884, $2,150,099 were appropriated; on March 3, 1885, $162,340 were appropriated; and subsequently a sum, found in the construction fund, under the act of August 5, 1882, amounting to $40,162, was applied to the same expenditure. The present bill for the armament of these cruisers carries an appropriation amounting to $251,863, and all of these make a total aggregate appropriation for this purpose to date of $3,904,464. As you will observe, the balance between the amount thus appropriated and expended and the amount estimated by the naval advisory board to complete the four cruisers is $194,840. I feel it my duty, Mr. Chairman, to say that there can be no question but that further deficiencies will come from the Navy Department before these vessels are finished. I wish the House to understand the proposition: I put upon record the above guess, and when I say guess, I mean guess; and I defy any gentleman upon this floor to do more than guess with reference to the past or future purposes or expenditures of the bureaus of the Navy Department.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to prophesy that under the present administration there may be deficiencies in the Navy Department which will require to be provided for?

Mr. BURNES. As I will show my friend from New York before I conclude, it is inevitable—no matter what party is in control of the Government, or what individual is at the head of the Navy—it is inevitable that in order to finish these vessels under existing methods large sums of money over and above the estimates of the advisory board must be appropriated in the future.

In order that I may be understood on this proposition, let me say that from the examination and investigation made we find the little Dolphin, estimated to cost $460,000, is finished, or practically finished. There are a few things, we are told, yet to be done the nature of which I do not know, neither does anybody else; but there is something to be done. But the Dolphin is afloat and practically finished. The Atlanta, it is said, is nearly completed. Now, you know what that means as well as I do. The Atlanta is nearly completed. The Boston will be finished, we are led to guess, say by July next. "It is in a good and advanced state." The work "is progressing favorably and promptly," and, let us hope, energetically. But it is not yet finished and will not be perhaps before the beginning of the fall, although we have some opinions that it will probably be finished during this fiscal year.

The Chicago is at least a year behind the Boston, that is to say, there is a year and three or four month's work yet to be done before the Chicago can be completed so as to receive her armament and move out upon the waves of the oceans.

If we will go to the Bureau of Ordnance we find that the estimates of the naval advisory board for the completion of the armament of the four vessels was $592,304. There have already been appropriated and expended $580,250. That would leave, as you observe, $12,054 yet on hand to be expended for the completion of the naval armament of these ships. But it is estimated, and it is but an estimate, that to complete this armament $343,000 will be required. Admitting that this estimate is a reliable guess, and that we shall be called upon for no more than the $343,000, you will observe that the armament alone which was estimated by the naval advisory board at $592,304 will have cost $923,250.03.

Now, if the armament alone is costing us 58 per cent. more than the estimates, you may make the calculation for yourselves as to the cost of the four cruisers complete. Or rather, if you are not fond of attempting the impossible you may make a simple guess, which will do just as well, in my judgment, as a calculation.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. BURNES. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The armament has been greatly changed and improved, and has cost more than was originally estimated. Yet my friend from Missouri will recollect we did not investigate touching the cost of the cruisers proper, and that in fact their construction was let by contract and at a very cheap rate. And as to whether the amount of contract would be exceeded, I am sure I am not informed by any investigation I have made. Is the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HISCOCK. When did the expenditure for the armament commence?

Mr. BURNES. It commenced immediately on the first appropriation of March 3, 1883.

Mr. HISCOCK. How much has been expended to the present time?

Mr. BURNES. Five hundred and eighty thousand two hundred and fifty dollars—$234,000 were immediately obligated on the passage of the bill of March 3, 1883.

Mr. HISCOCK. When was the balance expended?

Mr. BURNES. As some of my friends seem to misunderstand the proposition, I may as well explain it now as at any other time. The Secretary of the Navy allotted to the different bureaus certain sums of money; to the Bureau of Ordnance, $234,000; and, in the language of the chief of the bureau, immediate obligations to the amount of $234,000 were incurred.

Mr. HEWITT. That is true; but the money was not expended.

Mr. BURNES. So that while $234,000 had been set apart for this bureau to be expended, obligations were immediately incurred covering the whole amount so set apart. And if I allude to another matter in this connection my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not consider me partisan, for he knows I do not want to be, especially in the consideration of this bill. I am just as ready to hit a head on the one side as the other in discussing a purely business proposition. Strange as it may seem to you, Mr. Chairman, no sooner had this $234,000 been allotted to the Bureau of Ordnance, and no sooner had it been immediately covered by obligations, than the Secretary with one hand allotting it and allowing the obligations to be incurred, with the other drew out $195,000 of it for other purposes. I simply state this as a fact, not because the late Secretary of the Navy was opposed to me in politics, but because it is a fact that ought to be stated, criticised, considered.

Now we come to the business proposition remaining. We sought, after days of labor, to eliminate from this estimate of $343,000 everything that would not be actually necessary during the present fiscal year; and all the items reported in the bill are believed to be necessary for the continuation of the work. The foreign bills must be paid. Vouchers have been issued; the credit and honor of the country are involved, as well as its best interests. Under a system of book-keeping that pays out of one fund to be reimbursed by another they may have been provided for abroad. But in any event we find due to foreign creditors of the Government, for the armament of the cruisers, $37,294.84, and we are simply bound to pay them. There is no escape from it.

We then come to the next item, amounting to $138,713. These are items which we may call domestic bills—obligations of the Government to different establishments in Boston, West Point, &c., and to different parties who are furnishing material or are doing work for the Government. There are $138,713 of these domestic bills.

We might as well pay them now as at any other time. They have to be paid, they ought to be paid; because when we have our agent, whether he be the Secretary of the Navy or the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, who contracts these obligations and places the duty upon us to pay them, we are bound to discharge such obligations to our fellow-citizens or return to them the labor and material we have received from them. But of this $138,000, after a calculation or estimate made in consultation with the chief of the bureau, we found that only $89,483 of the amount need be appropriated during this fiscal year; so that instead of appropriating the whole sum, $138,000, which will have to be appropriated during the next fiscal year, we propose to appropriate at this time only $89,483. These two items aggregate what we owe at home and abroad on account of the Bureau of Ordnance.

Then comes an estimate of $130,913 for labor in the navy-yard at Washington and for the materials necessary to be used in profitably employing that labor. We have gone through the estimate, and we believe it is indispensably necessary to make this appropriation at once so that this work may go forward. It may be as well to state that between two hundred and three hundred men have been thrown out of employment for want of this appropriation, and it will be a benefit to the Government to re-employ those same men, many of whom are skilled workmen, and must very shortly seek employment elsewhere unless we make an appropriation to justify their re-employment at the navy-yard. We think, therefore, that this item should be allowed without any sort of question.

I wish now to call attention to the state of the work on the guns, as gentlemen may desire to know how far it has progressed. There are to be in all for the four cruisers twenty-one 6-inch guns, eight 8-inch guns, and two 5-inch guns. Of the 6-inch guns seven are completed, and fourteen about half completed. Of the 8-inch guns none are finished; one is nine-tenths done, two are three-quarters done, one is five-eighths finished, and eleven are not commenced. The two 5-inch guns are completed. There has been no test of the guns, certainly no statutory test, but there has been a large amount of practical unofficial firing. Of the gun-carriages, one for the 8-inch guns is nearly finished, one for the 8-inch guns is five-eighths finished, six for the 8-inch guns are scarcely commenced; seven for the 6-inch guns are half finished, and fourteen for the 6-inch guns are completed.

Thus I have given you the present condition of the guns and the gun-carriages, which are of course large items of expenditure. You will observe in the report that there is a large amount appropriated for powder. In view of the fact that the powder has to be manufactured in the spring on account of temperature, it was deemed necessary to retain the item providing for this expenditure.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I have gone through the different items in this bill, and I have attempted to do it in a fair, business-like manner, without any sort of reflection upon the friends of either side of the House, or of either party represented here; but I beg to say that, in my judgment, there is an immense amount of work for the Naval Committee of this House to do, and they should do it regardless of all consequences if they desire to prevent, as I am sure they do, vast and profligate expenditures of the people's money by some of the seemingly unrestrained and ungoverned bureaus of the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Did the gentleman state where those guns are being manufactured?

Mr. BURNES. At Boston and West Point.

Mr. HISCOCK. Before the gentleman sits down I wish to ask him this question: With this House, which originates the appropriations, in sympathy with the administration, do you think there will be any trouble in the future in so making appropriations that it will not be necessary to provide deficiencies? Is there any doubt about that? We have been for a long time hoping that we might reach that point, and I have frequently heard the declaration made upon this floor that no deficiencies ever ought to be voted.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that the appropriation made for the building of these cruisers was exceedingly unguarded and unbusinesslike. It was an appropriation of $1,300,000, to be expended without placing the responsibility upon any particular head or any particular bureau. It was an appropriation that left it within the power of the Secretary to put the money in one bureau, and then draw upon and expend it in another bureau. In the appropriation of July 7, 1884, when $500,000 were appropriated, we improved upon the original appropriation by providing that that should finish the armament, and indeed we had an estimate at that time that $500,000 would suffice to finish it; yet you see it lacks $343,000 of being sufficient. Other restrictions beneficial would have been thrown around it, perhaps, but for the well-known hostility of the other branch of Congress to such limitations.

But we have steadily improved in our modes and methods of appropriation, and from the date of the Robeson bill down to the present hour our legislation, under the direction and guidance of the Appropriations Committee of this House, has been a vast improvement upon the legislation that preceded it, so far as my limited ability and hours of labor have enabled me to investigate and determine.

More definitely answering the interrogation of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], I would say that there will always be trouble, and great trouble, in making appropriations so that no deficiency will occur. It is not sufficient to prevent deficiencies or other evils that the House is in sympathy with the administration; if both branches of Congress were in such sympathy the millennium of perfect appropriation bills might be said to be at hand. It is well known that many of the perfect forms of appropriation originating in this House have been relentlessly mutilated and disfigured in the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy a moment in reference to this appropriation for armament, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has just called attention. I agree with him as to the amount necessary to continue the work on the armament for the balance of the fiscal year. I do not, however, agree with him in some of his statements concerning the cost of the cruisers, including the armament. True, the committee in preparing this deficiency bill did not make as full inquiry as they probably will later touching the total expenditures made or hereafter to be made for the completion of the cruisers in every respect. Suffice it to say, however, that upon turning back to the act which the gentleman read—I call his close attention to it—the act authorizing these cruisers of March 3, 1883, we find that the sum of $1,300,000 was appropriated at that time in bulk for the commencement of the work upon the cruisers; and we find in that act this clause:

For the construction, &c.—

Mentioning the vessels—

as recommended by the naval advisory board in its report of December 20, 1882, $1,300,000. And the Secretary of the Navy—is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amount estimated by the said naval advisory board in said report, and to place the same under contract.

Now mark the language—

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind my colleague on the committee that the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance advised us that under that very provision of the statutes an opinion had been given by the Secretary, which left the whole matter in doubt as to whether it referred to each one of the different kinds of appropriations or was an appropriation as an entirety.

Mr. CANNON. Why, the appropriation speaks for itself. There is an appropriation of $1,300,000 to commence this work. Then authority was given that certain other appropriations theretofore made might be, so far as they could be, utilized. But the only limitation that was placed upon the construction of these cruisers by this original law was that they should be brought within the estimates made by the naval advisory board. That includes the cruisers and it includes the armament. Those estimates as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] were $4,099,304. That was the only limitation.

Remember, at that time there was also cast upon the Secretary of the Navy by the express language of the act not only the authority but a duty mandatory to construct these cruisers; and the force of that act rests upon him to-day. Now has the Secretary of the Navy expended or estimated in the aggregate one dollar over and above these estimates? I say he has not.

But after the cruisers have been contracted for, after the armament has been nearly completed, an expense of $400,000 and over is added for the improvement of the armament, making it better, if you please, by reason of these years of experience, until the cruisers are being armored in first-class manner. Step by step and year by year changes have been made, which, as anybody could see in this day of improvement, have been profitably made. Yet, notwithstanding this great increase for the improvement of the armament over and above the original estimate, we may take the price of the cruisers according to the contract and add to it the cost of the armament, and there is still nearly $100,000 unappropriated, unestimated for, within the limit originally fixed.

"But," says my friend, "when this sum of $1,300,000 was appropriated in lump, the Secretary of the Navy apportioned it among the bureaus; he apportioned $234,000 for armament, and afterward he found it convenient to take $193,000 of that amount and apply it to work in other bureaus for construction of the cruisers." Suppose he did. I take the position that under the provisions of this general law which made it his duty to construct these cruisers within the aggregate limit for both cruisers and armor, if economy of construction or necessity for construction made it his duty thus to so take the money, he had a right to do it, because all the while there was resting upon his shoulders this mandatory duty to construct these cruisers within the amount limited, and they had been placed under contract.

Why, sir, any other construction rests just as unfavorably upon the present Secretary of the Navy as upon the former Secretary, because while the present Secretary has been in place for a year this work on the armament has been going on; and during the last year, as the gentleman will bear me out in saying, changes in that armament for its betterment have been made to the amount of largely over $50,000. But he has gone on until he has expended the appropriation that was afterward made specific; and he comes to-day, long before the fiscal year has expired, and says, "Give me this money, or I must discharge nearly three hundred men, must stop the work upon the guns and armament, and can not pay the bills that have accrued since I took office on the 4th of March last."

Mr. HISCOCK. You mean that he has changed the plans—improved them?

Mr. CANNON. I mean that you may take the original estimates, and I speak now only of the armament, because I have not investigated or been called upon to investigate closely touching these cruisers otherwise—the Naval Committee will no doubt do that—but as to the armament only, I say that since this original act was passed improvements have been made and ought to have been made. I undertake to say, that if Secretary Chandler or the present Secretary of the Navy had gone to work and constructed the armament as was contemplated three or four years ago when this original act was passed without paying attention to the experience we have since had, without paying attention to recent improvements in guns and armaments, while such a course might have complied with the letter of the law, it would have been such a violation of its spirit and substance that the officer ought to have been censured and would have been censured by Congress.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I wish to ask my colleague a question. Having just come upon the floor, I do not understand the point he is referring to. Do you refer to the armament of the four ships—Boston, Atlanta, Dolphin, and Chicago?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I desire to say the original estimate for the armament of those vessels was $440,000.

Mr. CANNON. It has been stated exactly.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. At the time that estimate was made there never had been a high-power rifle gun made in the United States. It was not pretended by the Department at that time that anything like an accurate estimate could be made for the proper completion of this work. The original estimate, however, was granted. Subsequently, as has been stated by my colleague, developments showed the necessity for further appropriation, and an additional appropriation of about $200,000 was made for that work. It has progressed up to this time, and, as my colleague has stated, improvements have been added daily and monthly. New necessities have arisen along the pathway all the time. The character and quality of the armament have been improved more than 500 per cent. We at last have come to the knowledge of the fact that to complete it according to the spirit of the original bill will require almost $1,000,000. Hence there is an estimate for an additional appropriation to complete these guns.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That is the history of these uncertain estimates brought in from time to time. They grew out of our inexperience and our lack of knowledge on these points, but it is a satisfaction to know we have at last reached the ground from which reliable estimates can be furnished.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the gentleman has stated it better than I could have done, because his knowledge is more extensive. But, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that notwithstanding the figures in expense of armament are increased over half a million dollars, so far as anything appears in the investigation before the committee, and so far as I have any knowledge or belief, the armament and cruisers are yet by $92,000 within the limit fixed when we passed the original law three or four years ago. And this includes all appropriations made and estimates for same.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That is true.

Mr. CANNON. That is all I wish to say about it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Illinois explain the difference between himself and the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CANNON. I understand there is no difference between us so far as that is concerned touching the recommendations and provisions of this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood him to say there is a very large difference between you.

Mr. CANNON. No; I think not.

Mr. BURNES. I think not.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. He asks us to infer there will be.

Mr. CANNON. I did not so understand him, but he can speak for himself. He spoke of increase in the armament, but he did not speak of the decrease of the estimated cost of the hulls of the cruisers. I was trying to supplement his statement, covering not only the armament but the entire expenditures for the four cruisers.

Mr. HISCOCK. Taking the gross appropriations together, you are $100,000 inside of the original estimates.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I should like to have my colleague state further that the increased appropriation for the construction of this armament grows out of the fact a part of the appropriation made for the armament was applied to other purposes, and that this additional appropriation does not increase the aggregate cost beyond the limit fixed by the original bill.

Mr. BURNES. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; but I should like to answer that question, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri. I wish to say the gentleman from Illinois is partially right but substantially wrong. [Laughter.] After the $1,300,000 was assigned among the various bureaus $193,000 of the amount assigned for armament was used for payment upon the hulls of the cruisers.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. A portion was assigned.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; assigned by the Secretary. The Secretary, as he had the right to, so long as he kept within the original limit, made an improvement in the armament. Now, having said this much, I wish to pass to some of the other appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. One moment. I do not think the Secretary taking that money by assignment bears on the point of estimates or appropriations for ordnance in connection with these four steel cruisers. The original estimate was $592,000.

Mr. CANNON. For armament?

Mr. RANDALL. I am speaking of armament; $580,250 has been given by appropriation, and there is yet to give, so as to complete the armament, $343,000.

Mr. BURNES. Oh, no.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; we have given $580,250 that are available to date——

Mr. CANNON. That is over the original estimate.

Mr. RANDALL. No; but there is a further deficiency of $343,000 to be supplied, which shows that the original estimate was no guide to the cost, because before we complete we shall have to appropriate $923,250 in all, being $331,000 in excess of the estimate for the armament of these four vessels.

Mr. CANNON. Now I want to answer that just here. My friend states what is true as to the armament, I grant you; but I want again to call his attention to the law, that the construction of the cruisers and the armament shall not exceed a certain sum.

Mr. RANDALL. I am simply addressing myself to the facts and the figures as they appear in the estimate and appropriations, and I know these figures can not be controverted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the reference which has been made to the constant improvements and betterments which have been maintained in connection with this appropriation?

Mr. RANDALL. That is a mere supposition on the part of the Department, for the guns are I believe unfinished, except one which has been tested——

Mr. CANNON. I do not wish to be taken off the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. You shall have part of my time, if you desire.

Mr. CANNON. For in this connection I desire to correct a statement of my friend.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wanted to show that the estimates of the Department were entirely unreliable as made, as to ordnance, by the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; so far as the armament is concerned the estimates were not reliable, and so far as construction is concerned, the construction of the cruisers, the estimates were not reliable; but the armament runs substantially a half million of dollars over the estimate, and the construction of the cruisers over half a million of dollars under the original estimate, and therefore they about counterbalance each other. In fact, when you come to the total you find that you are yet nearly $100,000 within the limits fixed by the law and the original estimates of the naval advisory board. That is all I desired to say in that regard.

Now as to another item. There is another item of $4,000 for the compensation of special agents to examine the books, accounts, moneys, &c., in the several subtreasuries and depositories.

This work is done under a section of the Revised Statutes, and has been for years, and I suppose has been properly done. These examinations are made yearly. Heretofore the appropriation has never exceeded $4,000 per annum for this work.

The mode in which the work has been done heretofore has been to detail a certain number of clerks or employés from the Treasury Department to go and make the investigation, they doing the clerical labor and hiring laborers to do the heavy work and assist in lifting and weighing, &c. Now, I should have said nothing whatever about this appropriation but for the fact that my very good friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] says there are yet three subtreasuries to examine before they are all turned over to his Democratic friends. That is true, Mr. Chairman; but the examination to turn the subtreasuries over from one official to another is not a very difficult thing, not a very serious work; and there is no more difficulty in making the examination for that purpose than in making the ordinary annual examination.

Now the Treasurer gives a better reason for this, as follows, in a note appended to the estimate:

> Formerly the appropriation of $4,000 was sufficient for the year; but owing to the large accumulation of silver in the subtreasuries, the expenses of examining them are now more than doubled. The appropriation for 1886 is already exhausted, and an additional amount is needed for the remainder of the fiscal year.

There has been some accumulation of silver in the last year, and I have no objection to that as long as it is represented by silver certificates in circulation, for I would rather have the certificates than the silver; but I do not want to enter upon a discussion of the silver question now. Still you have an accumulation of silver, and you must have means for weighing it, and if you have accumulations of gold you must have facilities for weighing it; and if there is an abrasion of the coins, they must be counted from time to time. It is true the appropriation is exhausted; but the Treasurer says he needs $4,000 more, making $8,000 in all, and when he says it is necessary I am willing he shall have it. He is the Treasurer of the United States, a Democratic Treasurer, a high office under this Government; and when he states that he needs this appropriation I am for giving it to him, as I take it for granted that it is needed like other small incidental expenses personal to the office.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose there is no doubt that the clerks have been appointed under the civil-service law?

Mr. CANNON. Ask me someting easy. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT. Why does my friend from Illinois call this expense personal?

Mr. CANNON. Did I say personal?

Mr. HEWITT. I understood so?

Mr. CANNON. I meant with reference to the current administration of the affairs of his office. I mean in a sense so far personal to him as the head of the office.

Mr. HEWITT. And in the course of his official work?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. I am sometimes not quite apt in the use of words, and I did not know that I had used that expression. But there is another proposition here to which I wish to call attention; that is, an increase of $6,000 for repairs of the Treasury building.

Heretofore it has been $15,000 per annum. I mean the contingencies for that purpose. That is as much as it has ever been, I believe. Now there are $6,000 more. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] said there was some extraordinary expense on the roof. The gentleman will recollect the estimate stated this was necessary because the roof was leaking. It is true that a stitch in time saves nine, and I have come to the conclusion after investigation that that appropriation was necessary. I was only surprised at one thing, that now in the year of our Lord 1886 the rain would still run through the roof and that the iron and steel would corrode and rust under the administration of our Democratic friends.

Mr. HEWITT. But there is no leak in the Treasury now.

Mr. CANNON. "Oh," says my friend from New York, "there is no leak in the Treasury now." My friend will recollect that when the Treasury was turned over to the new administration it was found to be all right except one cent short, but afterward that the cent was found.

Mr. HEWITT. As the gentleman says, a stitch in time saves nine. We look after cents even.

Mr. CANNON. Well, you got that cent; and you have the opportunity to do all you were so anxious about in the last campaign—to count the money in the Treasury. I believe it was the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who started that cry.

Mr. HEWITT. Does not the law require it?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and we had counted it every year, and when you got it you found it was all correct.

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. A friend on this side suggests "turn the rascals out." I do not want to talk about that just now. I want to talk about this bill.

Mr. HEWITT. I can well understand that you do not want to talk about it.

Mr. CANNON. I will let you talk about it. But I will say I am willing you should turn out every man you have the nerve and manhood to turn out. I am willing you should turn out the fifty or sixty thousand Republican office-holders who may still be in the service of the Government if you can find Democrats competent to succeed them. But in doing so I want you to stand up as men that won the victory and say, as the truth is, "You are good officers"—as nearly all of them are—"but we have won the race. You must step out, and we will put our men in, who are honest, so far as the law will permit." I am willing you should turn them out in that way and turn your honest men in, as you won the race. I want nothing but manly dealing. I detest hypocrisy even in a little thing like the distribution of offices.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield me a moment to say a word in reference to the six-thousand-dollar item? The gentleman has stated correctly the appropriation was $15,000 last year. He will remember $6,400 of that was to be applied to a new roof, lessening by that amount the amount available for the general repairs of the building. That is the real reason why this deficiency of $6,000 is necessary.

Mr. CANNON. I so stated. But I stated also that while there has been a new roof this year, this deficiency is necessary to keep the new roof from leaking.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not to provide a new roof at all. The reason for it is that $6,400 of the $15,000 appropriated for the current year had to be expended on the new roof, consequently diminishing so much the amount for the general repairs of the building.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; the gentleman from Missouri made that explanation, and I have made it.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a very strong concurrence of testimony as to that.

Mr. CANNON. I have only referred to this to show that although there is a new roof on the Treasury Department this year, it is now necessary to tinker it so as to keep the water from coming in; and I express my surprise that such a thing should happen under a Democratic administration.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose when an appropriation was made on the 4th of last March it was thought sufficient, and the expenditure has been under the present administration.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no charge of abuse of the money by anybody.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make no such insinuation as that; only I am surprised at our being required to vote a deficiency for this service. It is unusual.

Mr. McCOMAS. I shall not detain the committee long, because I apprehend there can not be, and there certainly has not been, much room for division of sentiment with respect to these deficiencies. The items are only seven in number, and whatever may be the opinion as to the reasons for original expenditure, I think it is clear that they must now be conceded and this bill passed.

I am not surprised that some of my Republican brethren here expect too much from our Democratic friends if on the first day of the second year of a Democratic administration we celebrate the advent of an auspicious period of Democratic rule by bringing in a deficiency bill. It will be, perhaps, an admonition to add that it is simply an urgency bill, and that further on the House, if they choose, may look at other items of general deficiencies.

It does seem to me that, as a business proposition, there can be nothing else but the speedy passage of this bill in its main items. I say in its main items. I might possibly exclude the first one, to which my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has adverted; but when we are told by the Treasurer (and his estimate comes from the Secretary) that the accumulation of coin in the subtreasuries, as well as the counting of the moneys required by the change of administration involves a little extra care and labor, why that is one of the natural results of a change from a Republican to a Democratic administration, and upon personal inquiry I find that additional force is needed in the moving of the bags of coin and material in the sub treasuries when these counts take place.

But, Mr. Chairman, if this money shall be this year appropriated to make new employés—I do not mean to insinuate that it will be, but I say if I find that advantage is taken of a law now on the statute-book whereby additional employés may be engaged at $6 a day to count this currency—I serve notice that in the next session I as one humble member of this committee will ask the House to require that the present officials shall continue the method of their Republican predecessors, who detailed for this work persons already in the employ of the Government, instead of employing an additional force at $6 a day. In the faith that the present excellent official means not to use this increased appropriation—because it is an increased appropriation over that of the Republican administration—in the faith that he does not intend to use it for any such purpose, but only, as he has indicated, for the counting of the additional silver and the like, I favor that item in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say nothing with respect to the item of repairs in the Treasury building except that human nature Democratic, like human nature Republican, seems to require this annual expenditure, and as it was withheld last year, it comes now in the guise of a deficiency, which makes exactly the amount of the usual annual appropriation for this purpose. Now, if that roof does leak and it can be made still more solid, I say let this six thousand go and the economy with it.

As to the comprehensive remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] with regard to the fish, he has said all that is now required to be said concerning the codfish, five millions of which, propagated yonder in colder waters, have been taken to the Gulf, and which Professor Baird says can be there multiplied in myriads again and again. But, doubtless by inadvertence, in his otherwise complete statement, my colleague forgot to say that one hundred and fifty million eggs of whitefish and lake fish and shad have been hatched and are now on hand to supply the Northern lakes and inland rivers, the Potomac and the Western rivers, and those South and North; and to delay the distribution of these eggs would be to sacrifice all the expenditure in that direction which has been already incurred. So that it affects not only the codfish in the Gulf, but the whitefish and the shad in the rivers. I wish to make only one remark with respect to the item for artificial limbs.

The Surgeon-General has called attention to the fact that it may be, as has been said here, that the mere publication of the names on the pension-roll has accelerated and increased the demands upon the Government under the existing law for artificial limbs by those who were entitled to the commutation of $75 instead of a limb. I wish to call attention to the fact that we are doing in effect this year, on that appropriation, simply, as the gentleman from New York has said, what we were asked to do last year, and that the commutation oftentimes amounts to far more than the limbs.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is one private on the roll, who belonged to the Second Minnesota Cavalry, who lost not only his two legs but also his two arms, and, under the law, he is entitled to and has applied for and is now receiving an allowance for the two arms and the two legs which he lost in the defense of his country. So that while on the roll you may find the names of eighteen thousand persons, you will also find that in some cases there are two, three, ay, even four allowances to one person, the soldier being entitled to these allowances under the promise of his Government by reason of loss of limbs by shot or shell, or on account of rheumatism, nervous trouble, paralysis, &c. I think that with the light which we have we can not do otherwise than make the appropriation for this object, because the money in hand, according to the official report, is not sufficient to-day to pay the transportation of wounded and disabled soldiers, who require to be examined every five years; and the period for such examination has now arrived.

Mr. Chairman, I have a word only to say with respect to the matter of the cruisers. I confess, as the distinguished chairman of the committee has said—not because men have been derelict in duty, I do not say that, but because men do not seem to know that which has not yet been tested or tried—we have a remarkable and significant result in the estimates with respect to these cruisers. The proper committee, the Committee on Naval Affairs, when it comes to make provision upon this subject—and I speak as one who aspires to see our coast on the Atlantic, on the Pacific, on the Gulf, and on the lakes defended as becomes a great nation and a greater people—the committee will be required to see that estimates are very carefully guarded; for it is true that $592,000 was the first estimate for the armament of these four vessels; and that estimate having been made in March, 1883, when the question came before the committee and the House on July 7, 1884, it was found that the sum of $683,000 was required instead of $592,000; and keeping pace with the advance of military science and gunners, which seems to go on almost with the celerity of inventive thought all over the world, there was added in July, 1884, an estimate for the Hotchkiss guns, fifty-four in number, making the estimate $737,000. And now the experts in charge of this work say that having expended $580,000, having contracted already under pressing obligations and in view of present needs for an expenditure of $176,000 more, there will be required $166,000 according to their estimate to complete the armament of these four cruisers.

Thus it is true, Mr. Chairman, that the honest and mistaken estimate of $592,000, and the more accurate estimate of $737,000 are now under the teachings of one year's experience swelled to $952,000. Thus it was true under the last administration, and it is true under the present administration of the Navy Department, that as to this matter of armament the officers of the Government have been somewhat in the dark and are feeling their way; and I agree with my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri, that so far as can now be ascertained $166,000 may not be sufficient to finish the armament of these vessels.

But, Mr. Chairman, while we have thus been groping in the dark with respect to the armament of the cruisers, the most gratifying progress has been made. The Dolphin, having breasted every storm of public criticism and every gale of the tropics, has been virtually completed and accepted. To-day the Atlanta is nearly finished. The Boston is only three months behind, and the Chicago lags only a little in the rear. We shall therefore soon have four of these cruisers, built under contract with a degree of economy which is most encouraging for the future of the Navy in this regard.

Whilst we have thus had these cruisers built with extraordinary cheapness, it at the same time becomes gentlemen to "keep a weather eye open" for extraordinary estimates with respect to the armament of new cruisers, and those estimates should be subjected to the most careful examination. But to-day, with the men of the Washington navy-yard discharged, with the machinery for these great guns standing silent, with the guns themselves lying in the forge, their further progress arrested, there is nothing else to be done than out of the $343,000 now asked by the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy to give the sum of $251,000. It will pay outstanding foreign obligations, which are a debt of honor, and will meet the demands of current contracts already due and pressing. I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, we can not in my judgment do otherwise than pass this deficiency bill, and guard ourselves carefully in the future when the other deficiencies come here a month or two later.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask that the bill be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk (proceeding to read the bill for amendment) read as follows:

For payment of foreign and domestic bills, for which vouchers have been issued and approved by the Bureau of Ordnance, for the armament of the new steel cruisers, $37,294.84, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

Mr. HEWITT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of putting a question to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] in charge of this bill. I wish to inquire whether the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department has incurred debts on behalf of the United States in advance of an appropriation and, if so, under what authority these debts have been incurred, and whether the statute as it now stands permits an officer of this Government in advance of an appropriation to incur a debt on behalf of the United States?

Mr. BURNES. In answer to my friend from New York, I will repeat a statement I have before made. The Secretary of the Navy after allotting $234,000, which was immediately covered by obligations, withdrew $195,000 of the money thus covered by obligations and used it for other purposes. It will be perceived that the obligations were contracted upon the basis of the allotment, and the gentleman may say the withdrawal of the money after the allotment was illegal, or irregular, or inappropriate and unfair. The $500,000 appropriated in July, 1884, exclusively for armament, were sufficient to save the Department from any necessity of violating the law, if it were applied as the law required; but if the $195,000 improperly taken from the bureau after allotment were replaced out of the $500,000, then the law, in my opinion, was doubly violated. If, as claimed by the Bureau of Ordnance, the $195,000 were not replaced out of the $500,000 appropriated, then I presume the violation of law may be considered as confined to the transaction of withdrawing the $195,000 from the bureau after obligations covering it had been incurred.

Mr. HEWITT. My friend from Missouri does not answer my question, which I have put for a purpose. Subsequently to the transfer of the $195,000 an appropriation was made on the 7th of July, 1884, of $500,000, out of which the money so transferred to other bureaus was made good. There being $500,000 in hand, there was at least $300,000 surplus available at that time by the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department for the purchase of ordnance. I very well remember the discussion on this floor when I defended that appropriation of $500,000. The then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thought that there was money enough available for ordnance and that nothing additional was required. It now turns out that, having $300,000 in hand over and above the $197,000 which had been replaced, an officer of this Government contracted obligations to the amount of $120,000 for which there was no appropriation whatever. I call attention to the matter now, because I think this practice most reprehensible. I think it is contrary to the statute; and I trust that now, when a new administration has come into power—I do not know whether these contracts were made under the old or the new administration——

Mr. HISCOCK. I was about to ask under which administration they were made.

Mr. HEWITT. I say I do not know, and therefore I can not state. But whether they were made under this administration or under the last, the practice is reprehensible; and I call the attention of the House to it at this moment in order that this bad practice may not be continued or repeated.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that the expenditure he now speaks of was made under this administration, within the last twelve months.

Mr. BURNES rose.

Mr. HEWITT. It does not matter where it is made. I condemn it, and I ask the House to condemn it.

Mr. BURNES. Let me go a little further and fully answer the inquiry you made. After this transaction, when $195,000 were taken from the Bureau of Ordnance, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the appropriation of $500,000 there was no provision this $195,000 or the obligations created thereon should be repaid.

Mr. HEWITT. Nor was it necessary.

Mr. BURNES. But in fact it was not repaid, nor any part of it. I say the wrong done was in recalling the $195,000 after the allotment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Missouri whether it is true the wrong was done then? When a Department has exhausted its money is there anything to do but to stop work?

Mr. RANDALL. That is it.

Mr. HISCOCK. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says I am right.

Mr. HEWITT. We all agree you are right.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that no officer has a right to involve the Government in contracts or expenditures of money beyond the appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. What I am deprecating is the effort on the part of the gentleman from Missouri to throw the blame back.

Mr. RANDALL. We have over and over again in the Appropriations Committee inserted a clause to prevent this practice on the part of officials.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope it will be lived up to in the future.

Mr. HEWITT. I wish to take issue in the most distinct manner with the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. I do not do it because I wish to antagonize him on his bill, but because I wish to lay the verdict of censure on this bad practice. When $500,000 was made available to the Chief of Ordnance of the Navy Department it was his business to discharge the bills he encountered under that allotment. That was what he did. Out of the $500,000 every dollar of the then existing obligation was paid. And if he had not then the money available to go on with his work, it was his business to come back to the House with an estimate and not expend a dollar until an appropriation was made therefor.

Mr. BURNES. The distinguished gentleman from New York I believe misconceives the law. This appropriation, made in 1884 for the current fiscal year, nor any part of it, could be used in payment of prior expenditures. By express law it must be used in that current year for work and obligations incurred in that year.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the statement of the gentleman from New York is correct, because the second appropriation was in the line of the first, to get guns for these four vessels; and the natural and right thing to do was, if they went beyond the limit of the law and involved the Government in expenditures, to pay that first.

Mr. HEWITT. Let me supplement that by saying as a matter of fact that is what they did. They took the money and discharged every one of those obligations. If, as the gentleman from Missouri said, it was contrary to law, then they violated the law twice over.

Mr. RANDALL. This whole transaction is inexcusable, and the officials should have promptly reported the facts to the House, so the remedy might have been in an additional appropriation.

Mr. BURNES. One word more and I am done. The gentleman from New York says as a matter of fact the $195,000 were repaid out of the $500,000. As a matter of fact, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance says it was not done. Very likely the gentleman from New York is the better informed of the two as to the fact. I simply report the fact to the House that the officials who did this thing say that out of the $500,000 these $195,000 were not repaid, and that that $195,000 never was made good, nor the obligations based thereon paid.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say that the $500,000 did not more than pay all the contracts outstanding?

Mr. HEWITT. I can settle it out of his own mouth.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman is defending the administration.

Mr. BURNES. I never defend wrong anywhere.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; I know you do not.

Mr. HEWITT. In regard to this estimate of $197,757, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, Commodore Sicard, writes on the 20th day of January, 1885, as follows:

> This money was obligated on orders given for the ordnance outfit of the steel cruisers, but pending the delivery of the material, and before the appropriations for 1885 became available, the money was used by the Department to meet demands for payment of bills incurred in the construction of the hulls of the ships.

Now that amount was over $195,000. Unless, then, he has paid some portion of that amount, how is it possible that he can come here and ask for only an appropriation of $175,000 to pay all the outstanding bills? He must have paid a portion of it or he would have wanted the whole $197,000 in this deficiency bill.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KING. What document does the gentleman from New York read?

Mr. McCOMAS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary; there is an amendment pending.

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that if this be true as stated here, that our friends upon the other side are naturally concerned in defending the administration——

Mr. RANDALL. Nobody said that; but that we do not defend wrong under any circumstances, and no matter by whom done.

Mr. McCOMAS. I understand what the gentleman said; but candor compels me to say that I agree fully with the chairman of the committee, and can correct the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] by giving him the correct figures, which will painfully show that during the last current year, from March 4 until now—that is, from March 4, 1885, down to March 5, 1886—there can be no escape from the fact that the officials in charge of this armament have exceeded the bounds of the law and have expended more money than was appropriated. Five hundred thousand dollars was the sum appropriated; $234,000 was the sum allotted by the Secretary under the law.

Now you take the total of $734,000, and they have already expended $580,000 and were only entitled to $153,747 more by the very paper my honored friend from New York holds in his hand, which shows that they have expended over $176,000 in excess. If that has been done by Republicans in the past I do not know the fact; if it was done by them it was wrong, and always wrong no matter who did it. If it was done by the Democrats within the last year, or is being done now, it is wrong, and it is just as wrong as it was before if the Republicans did it, and I raise my voice in protest against it.

I say that it is a wrong which is not defensible in any party, I care not who does it, and if it was done the year before last and I had been here I would have denounced it, and I denounce it now. I am only willing to vote this appropriation, Mr. Chairman, because it has been expended and the amount is invoked so that the administration may feel that there is that in this action of the House, which I have spoken of in my previous remarks, which will put a stop to these expenditures without authority and excesses without power in the future.

Mr. HEWITT. Will the gentleman tell me why he says he rose to correct my statement, when he has made the same statement that I did and referred to the same facts that I did? I would like to know how he means to correct me?

Mr. McCOMAS. I only want to say that I wished to place the matter correctly before the House and wanted to protect these appropriations in future against such abuses and to place the exact figures before this House.

Mr. HEWITT. Then I wish the gentleman would use the words that express his meaning and not undertake to correct a statement of mine which is simply confirmed by what he says himself.

Mr. KING. I would like to have the gentleman from New York state what document it was from which he read.

Mr. HEWITT. I read an extract of a letter from the chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, Commodore Sicard, dated January 20, 1885, embodied in Senate Executive Document No. 97, second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting an estimate for appropriations for completing the ordnance of the new steel cruisers.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there is no amendment pending I renew that of the gentleman from New York.

Gentlemen upon the other side have severely condemned what is said to be an illegal expenditure of this money under this administration. I am not so familiar with the details of this matter as to be able to say whether there has been an illegal expenditure of money or not, though I am inclined to think there has been. But I also desire to put on record the fact that the illegal expenditure of money has been made by the same officials in the Department who have been there under the last administration and who are still retained in place.

Mr. McCOMAS. Does that make it right?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; it does not. I want to show, however, to the gentleman that if this administration has been derelict in anything it has been in its slowness in turning the rascals out.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not know this whole expenditure ought to be, and is by law, under the control of the head of the Department?

Mr. SPRINGER. I know these matters are all nominally under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, as other appropriations are nominally under the control of other heads of Departments. But the fact is, no one man can supervise the expenditure of all the appropriations.

He must necessarily and does actually depend in all these matters upon the advice and recommendation of his subordinates. Gentlemen upon the Appropriations Committee know that that is the regular proceeding in all these matters.

I believe Mr. Whitney has desired to observe the law. I believe that if his attention had been called to it he would have enforced the law. I believe now his attention is called to it he will see to it that these unworthy officials whom he has inherited from his predecessors shall be turned out and Democrats, honest Democrats as I know they will be, put in their places.

Mr. HEWITT. I send to the desk and ask to have read sections 3678 and 3679 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3678. All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others.

SEC. 3679. No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

Mr. HEWITT. Now I have asked for the reading of those sections of the Revised Statutes in order that it may not hereafter be alleged that due notice has not been given to these public officials that they will be held to strict account in this House and before the public judgment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend by striking out the last two words.

I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman frow New York [Mr. HEWITT] and to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER]. That law which the gentleman from New York has had read is no doubt the law applicable to the expenditure of ordinary appropriations. But if it is to be strictly enforced I will say to him that within the next sixty days or thirty days the mail service would stop on every railroad in this country, owing to the insufficient appropriations for that service. Yet the service will continue, because there is a law independent of the appropriation which says it shall continue.

Mr. HEWITT. There is a law for that.

Mr. CANNON. So you may say as to certain expenditures here. The law of 1883 required the Secretary of the Navy to build these ships, both hull and armament, within a certain amount, the work to be contracted except the armament. The contracts were made, and the whole expenditure and obligation are within the limit originally fixed, so the acts must be so construed as to make all of them operative.

But now a word to my friend from Illinois, who always goes straight to the point. I admire him for that, and always have done so. What are the facts in this case? The Navy Department is organized into bureaus, and at the head of those bureaus are naval officers, every one of them. I do not know what their politics are; I do not care; I have no defense to make for them. The gentleman from Kansas says they are Mugwumps. They may be, or they may be Democrats; I care not at all. It is said that the most of them are Democrats. The President, Commander of the Army and Navy, has the power to transfer any or all of them, in the twinkling of an eye, to duty elsewhere.

I know further, your Secretary of the Navy, if they be, as my colleague from Illinois claims, dishonest and rascals—and they belong to the Navy and are regular Navy officers—has failed to perform his duty if he has not asked the President to do this; and if he has done so and the President has refused, but one course is left to the Secretary of the Navy as an honest and independent man, and that is to resign. So you can travel down either road you please; you can say on the one hand that your Secretary of the Navy and your President are dishonest; and if you do not want to travel down that road, take the other and say that they are foolish and incompetent. You can travel down whichever road you please. The law and my colleague made the situation. Which of the two does the gentleman from Illinois choose for President and Secretary of the Navy? I pause for an answer.

Mr. HEWITT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. I was devoting my attention to my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] and should like to have a reply from him.

Mr. HEWITT. Did my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who knows so much now about the public business, who knows more about it than almost any other member, did he know as much when he came here fifteen or twenty years ago—Heaven knows how long ago; his hair has thinned as mine has done since we first came here—did he know as much then as he does now? And have these gentlemen in the Executive Departments had the long experience the gentleman from Illinois has had? Is he not willing to give us a little time to get our hands in, and is it not necessary that abuses of long standing should be pointed out in order that reform may come in, and is it not the duty of the friends of these gentlemen to point out every violation of law as it occurs or comes to our notice? And if we do perform this duty, are we not entirely true to the doctrine we laid down and the pledges we gave to the people, that we would reform the Government if it should be intrusted to our administration?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York has asked me a question. I hope I will be indulged in a reply. I want to say I accept his apology for the President and Secretary of the Navy, but beg leave to say it is always perilous to put ignorance at the helm even if honesty go with it, and I suggest that the gentleman add to ignorance of public men and measures on the part of the Executive modesty; and in view of the gentleman's confessions I suggest that he stop his President and stop his Secretary of the Navy and stop his Mugwump and Democratic admirers all over the country, from one ocean to the other, crying out eternally, morning, noon, and night, "Great and honest and wise are we!" [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise; and in making that motion allow me to say that I had fondly hoped that we could get through this discussion of business propositions without resorting to the political pyrotechnics to which some gentlemen seem always ready to resort on the shortest possible notice and without the slightest provocation. I regret it, sir, for a reason which I will state. Under former administrations it was never my fortune to meet a Democrat in service here. Our sympathy was never reached by the appointment of our brethren to important offices. With all their kindness and courtesy—for which I thank them—their attentions never took that form. I can not defend them; and being down, although I fear not as fully out as we on this side could desire, I need not harass them.

In the Navy Department I have not found enough Democrats under the present administration to justify me in making a partisan appeal. Therefore I have simply contented myself with looking at the business aspect of these propositions. My motion is that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] withhold his motion for a moment while I correct a statement of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon my motion. As I have not yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] I can not yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line of the pending bill. I make that motion in order that I may have read at the Clerk's desk section 3690 of the United States Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and balances not needed for such purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund. This section, however, shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rose simply for the purpose of having that section of the statutes read and making one remark. Taking the three sections of the statute together bearing upon this subject, sections 3678, 3679, and 3690, it seems to me that no portion of the $500,000 appropriation referred to could have been applied to the payment of the $195,000 upon which this item of the deficiency rests; that it was not subject to that application, that it was an appropriation to be applied to the payment of contracts made during the current year, and did not admit of being applied to any preceding liability incurred by this bureau.

A single additional word. I do not know how often gentlemen upon this floor have witnessed just such debates as those which we have listended to during the last few minutes, in which there has been unqualified condemnation of the violation by the Departments of these three provisions of law, and yet it is manifest that notwithstanding the earnestness on this subject which may be expressed here, as long as Congress goes on promptly, as we are doing in this instance, to vote every dollar that is required to make up deficiencies created in violation of law this practice by the Departments will continue. We can not even wait until the regular deficiency bill comes in, but must hasten to pass a special act for the purpose of appropriating moneys to meet liabilities incurred without authority of law. If it is the intention of the House that these three exceedingly important provisions of law shall be complied with by the Departments, you have got to indicate it by something else than the mild protest of speeches on this floor.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Then would not the proper method be to vote that item out of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. If this item is voted out and a few other similar ones there would be left only new appropriations of money for the current year. Here is over $600,000 to be appropriated, part of it new appropriations, not deficiencies; appropriations for the current year, not to meet obligations heretofore incurred, but for the current year, the balance deficiencies in the main originating in violation of law. It is not clear by any means what ought to be done by Congress in such cases, but it is certain that the practice of appropriating money to meet deficiencies, except in cases where causes for the expenditure are imperative and could not be foreseen, ought to cease.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to correct my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in regard to the persons who are performing the duties of heads of these bureaus. The gentleman at the head of the Ordnance Bureau is Captain Sicard. He is a naval officer, it is true, and the law requires that the person appointed to this position shall be a naval officer. The name of the appointee is sent to the Senate by the President. The only restriction upon the President is that the appointee shall be a naval officer. This gentleman has been appointed under the law and is serving. It is alleged that the President should have removed him if incompetent.

The President has been engaged in removing officials found to be unfit or incompetent, but it was impossible for him in the brief space of one year to remove all the incompetent and unworthy officials that he found in office a year ago. He has removed six hundred and forty and odd, and there are twice as many more demanding his attention; and yet the Senate hesitates about confirming the successors to those he has removed. He is obstructed in what he has already done, yet here are gentlemen complaining of him for not doing more. Just give him an opportunity. Confirm his nominations at the other end of the Capitol, and another year will not have passed until the President will have gone through all the Departments of the Government and put honest men in place of those who have abused their trusts.

Mr. DUNHAM. Have you not complained of him faster than we have?

Mr. HEPBURN. For instance, in regard to one of the judges of New Mexico?

Mr. SPRINGER. He was an honest man—as honest a man as any on this floor. I know him well.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent that this debate be closed. If this be not agreed to, I shall move that the committee rise.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. I want to say to the perturbed gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] that since the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House has had charge of the naval appropriation bill we have found that there has existed and is existing in the Navy Department a gross abuse with regard to these appropriations. Take the current appropriation for the maintenance of the Navy—for the carrying on of the Department. You may give a lump sum for maintaining the Navy and another lump sum for the civil list; but every ship in the navy-yards may fall to pieces, every dock may become decayed, before the salary list of the Navy goes down a dollar. What do they do? If they find that the question is between repairing a leak in a ship, maintaining a dock that is decaying, or keeping some man on the pay list, the leak goes unrepaired, the dock goes on decaying, but the man remains.

Mr. DUNHAM. Docks do not vote.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, unless this House will let the Navy Department know that only specific items will be dealt with here, that the pay-roll, the civil list of those employed in the navy-yards, shall be submitted to us, this abuse will go on. I can tell the gentleman from Maryland that so far as the majority of this House is concerned, so far as the present Committee on Naval Affairs of this House is concerned, we intend in the naval appropriation bill to submit to the House the items which go to make up the large amount annually appropriated to carry on this vast establishment.

These appropriations have been abused—not alone with regard to the maintenance of the navy-yards and the payment of the civil list, but one fund has been borrowed from constantly to help another. Of course they can avoid reporting a deficiency. Why, sir, the other day a prominent officer of the Navy was before the Naval Committee asking for a lump appropriation to pay the men employed and another to maintain the navy-yards; and he stated that he did not care to which appropriation we made the addition, "for," said he, "if you will increase the amount asked for maintaining ships and keeping them in good repair, I can borrow from that and so maintain the same salary list."

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr HEWITT] has brought this matter to the attention of the House and the country. I think I can safely promise for the Naval Committee and for the majority of this House that henceforward this abuse shall be stopped.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to confirm the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that year after year we are called upon here to make protests against the violation of the law by the Executive Departments of the Government in expending money which they are not authorized by law to expend, and in fact taking away from the Congress of the United States the power to determine how much money shall be used by the Departments. One purpose of the Constitution was that Congress should determine the amount of money to be expended by the Executive Departments; but those Departments have become so accustomed to violate the law and to make expenditures not justified by law, that it is expected that as a matter of course they will go on and spend what money they please and that we will make up the deficiency.

The gentleman from Indiana, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, has advised us that the only deficiency in this bill is one which was created in violation of law; that the other items are original items of appropriation. I do not know what the gentleman from Indiana means to do with reference to this bill; but I have heard no protest from him against reporting it to the House, and I infer that he will vote for the bill. For myself I shall cease to make mere verbal protests. Upon every showing like this I shall record my vote against the passage of the bill containing appropriations to meet deficiencies thus created in violation of law; and I trust that this House in the face of such a record as we have presented will make a protest which can be understood henceforward on this subject.

Mr. MCADOO. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCREARY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had directed him to report without amendment and with a recommendation that it be passed the bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire what was the remark made a while ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that called upon the Democratic side not to vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. And the Republican. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair this is not one of the general appropriation bills, and the rules do not require the yeas and nays to be taken on its passage. The yeas and nays therefore will not be taken unless demanded by some member and ordered by the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 33, noes 96; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 230, nays 20, not voting 73; as follows:

YEAS—230.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, on motion of Mr. EDEN, the recapitulation of the names was dispensed with.

Under the rule the following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk until further notice:

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. REESE with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, with Mr. JACKSON, until March 9.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. HARMER, until Tuesday next.

For this day:

Mr. HILL with Mr. COOPER.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. BUCK.

Mr. TARSNEY with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. CASWELL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. HAYNE.

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, with Mr. WEST.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. JOHNSON, of New York.

Mr. SKINNER with Mr. BAKER.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, on this vote.

Mr. WADE with Mr. DIBBLE.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announcing the passage of joint resolution (H. Res. 46) accepting from Julia Dent Grant and William H. Vanderbilt objects of value and art presented by various foreign governments to the late General Ulysses S. Grant; in which concurrence was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar; and pending that motion I desire to yield a moment to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], who wishes to make a request of the House.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, not having time to conclude what I had intended to say on the pension appropriation bill, I supposed I had asked leave of the House to extend my remarks, but the RECORD shows that I only asked leave to print some extracts from the reports. I now ask unanimous consent to print some additional remarks in the RECORD upon that bill.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SPRINGER was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

HENRY WASHBURN AND THOMAS WASHBURN.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 398) for the relief of Henry Washburn and Thomas Washburn, reported adversely from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. SPRINGER. By request this bill was laid aside informally on last Friday in order to await the arrival of my colleague from Illinois. After consulting with him I find that he does not desire to press the passage of the bill against the adverse report of the committee. I therefore move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

B. JENNINGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the the sum of $3,114.66 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay B. Jennings, late register of the land office of the United States at Oregon City, to reimburse said Jennings for money expended by him as said register, between the 1st day of June, 1859, and December 31, 1860, for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses during said period, not heretofore allowed or paid.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. NEAL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings, having considered the same, respectfully report:

This bill was reported favorably by Senator SLATER, from the Committee on Public Lands, at the last session of the Senate, and again reported favorably by Senator DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, this session. Your committee adopt the report of Senator SLATER, concurred in by Senator DOLPH, which is as follows:

That the claimant, B. Jennings, was register at the United States land office at Oregon City, in the State of Oregon, and between April 1, 1859, and January, 1861, he paid out of his private funds for clerical service in his said office the sum of $3,114.66, as shown by vouchers forwarded to the General Land Office under date of December 17, 1860, in obedience to a circular letter of the Department of date August 6, 1860.

This claim was reported to Congress by the Department, and its payment recommended, in 1861.

The history of this claim is very fully set forth in a letter addressed to Hon. H. M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of date February 6, 1884, from which the following is taken:

"By circular instructions from this office, dated August 16, 1860 (copy herewith), registers and receivers were directed to transmit tabulated statements of amounts paid by them for clerical services rendered under acts of Congress approved August 20, 1818 (vol. 3, p. 466, U. S. Stats.), and August 18, 1856 (vol. 11, p. 91, U. S. Stats.).

"In compliance with said instructions, B. Jennings, register of the land office at Oregon City, presented a statement, supported by the proper vouchers (copies herewith), from which it will be seen that the several amounts paid by him aggregate $3,114.67. On January 19, 1861, the then Commissioner of this office addressed a communication to the acting Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to pay this claim, and December 21, 1880, this office again recommended the payment of the above amount.

"The extraordinary services rendered by the clerks employed by Mr. Jennings were occasioned by the large number of donation claims passed upon in the Oregon City office, there being of this class 9,040, besides the selection of school and other lands, as set forth in a statement made to this office by Mr. Jennings on December 17, 1860. (See copy herewith.)

"Mr. Jennings has complied with the requirements of the Department by filing the necessary accounts and vouchers. I am of opinion that the claim is a just one."

In a subsequent communication of the same date, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner further says:

"Referring further to my report of the 6th instant on Senate bill No. 510, for the relief of B. Jennings, late register at Oregon City, Oreg., I have the honor to state that neither the register nor receiver at that office had at any time public moneys of the United States in their possession applicable to payment of salaries of clerks, and that the payments by Mr. Jennings for such services must therefore have been paid from his private funds."

It is unquestioned that additional and extraordinary clerical services were required in bringing up the business of this office; that such services were secured and paid for by Mr. Jennings, and that the Government has had the full benefit of these services and has never reimbursed Mr. Jennings therefor.

Therefore your committee recommend that the bill should pass.

LAND OFFICE, OREGON CITY, December 17, 1860.

SIR: Herewith please find vouchers No. 1, Thomas J. McCarver; No. 2, Samuel Holmes; No. 3, Thomas J. McCarver; No. 4, D. B. Hannah; No. 5, Edward T. Jennings; No. 6, William L. White; and No. 7, William B. Campbell, and tabular statement on account of reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses in the land office at Oregon City.

Your circular letter of 16th August last requires a statement of the kind of service rendered. The services are various, consequent upon the large arrearage of labor growing out of the donations to actual settlers in Oregon.

This communication has been delayed some five or six weeks, that I might be able to give in detail all and every species of extraordinary labor growing out of donations. After this delay, with diligent investigation, I find myself no nearer accomplishing the end than when I first began.

Bearing in mind the terms of the act of 1818, the allowance thereby made for clerical assistance, I desired to ascertain the aggregate area of land the Government had given away, thereby depriving this office of the percentage contemplated by that act for clerical aid. The record shows the number of claimants, but does not show conflicts, area, or any of the existing embarrassments. Upon the receipt of your circular above referred to, 16th August last, with the assistance of the clerk, Mr. White, I commenced searching records, maps, and papers, determined to give a full history of all the facts connected with the duties and labors in this office, but finding the search so materially trespassing upon the more important business of the office, I was compelled to abandon the further search and submit the case with a brief statement. The records show eight thousand and forty donation claims upon surveyed lands, and over one thousand upon unsurveyed lands; many of the latter, however, have been located upon the respective townships in which they reside after the surveys were completed.

I have examined about five thousand claims, and if those not examined will compare with those examined, will embrace about 2,400,000 acres of land. This land at $1.25 per acre would have been a neat little sum in the Treasury of the United States. An office in the receipt of that amount of money from the sales of public lands, the probability is, there would be but little difficulty in obtaining appropriations for clerical aid, fuel, lights, and other expenses in the land office; but as Congress saw fit to donate lands to actual settlers in Oregon, it is fair to presume a consideration; if so, the Government is as much under obligation to perfect the title to their claims as if they had paid for their land in cash.

The additional labor growing out of donations being an excess of labor over and above the ordinary sales of public lands:

1. Filing, recording, and platting notifications.
2. Taking primary proofs, filing and recording the same.
3. Taking the final proofs, filing and recording the same.
4. Adjusting conflicts of boundaries.
5. Change of boundaries, to avoid conflicts or to include their improvements.
6. To hear and determine difficulties between husband and wife as to the division of their claims.
7. Selection of lands by university commissioners in broken legal subdivisions, made so by donation claims.
8. Selection of lands by superintendent of common schools in lieu of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, taken by donation.
9. Furnishing abstracts of notifications to surveyor-general of claims entitled to survey.
10. Additional labor in tract books.
11. Additional labor in making donation certificates accompanied by special plats.
12. Copying a map of papers preparatory to making donation certificates.
13. Numerous correspondence.

The first, second, third, seventh, and eighth will not longer be burdensome to this office. The fourth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, the labor will be immense, for which no correct estimate can be made.

The labor above enumerated embraces the character of service rendered by the clerks employed by me. One class of service, however, not mentioned is that performed by E. T. Jennings, as notary public, without charge to parties visiting the office.

I most respectfully ask your assistance in procuring an appropriation to meet the expenses and liabilities thus incurred.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. JENNINGS, Register.

COMMISSIONER GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The report of the committee sets out very fully the facts upon which this bill was based. It seems to me that the payment of this claim was recommended first by the Secretary of the Interior in 1861, and again in 1880. The fact is that this claimant, who was register of the land office in Oregon City, paid out in 1859 three thousand one hundred and odd dollars for the Government which has never been repaid to him, and this claim arises, Mr. Chairman, under a plain provision of the statute. He was authorized to make these expenditures, which were to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior for approval and payment.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMAN].

Mr. HERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman who has charge of this bill for this courtesy, and I thank him as well as the committee of which he is a member most profoundly and with heartfelt gratitude for the kind words incorporated in the report now before us for action.

I have known the venerable Col. Berryman Jennings from boyhood. I am to a certain extent acquainted with the facts cited in the report of the committee. Colonel Jennings is now in advanced years and is upon a bed of suffering. In 1859, 1860, and 1861 Colonel Jennings occupied the position of register of the Oregon City land office in the State of Oregon. At that time the compensation of registers and receivers was fixed at a stated or maximum salary of $500, together with such compensation, not to exceed $3,000 in all, from a stated commission of 1 per cent upon the sales of public lands made by them. In 1850 Congress passed an act granting certain portions of these lands to settlers coming to Oregon as an inducement for settlement. The lands so taken by settlers under the donation act amounted to about 3,000,000 of acres, and therefore took that much from the public lands upon which the registers and receivers would have been entitled to 1 per cent. had the lands been sold under the pre-emption act or by cash entry. Therefore the officers were deprived of this source of revenue in order to make up the maximum compensation allowed by law.

They were also authorized by the act of 1856 to employ clerical hire and to render vouchers to the Interior Department, which, upon being approved by the Department, were forwarded to Congress for payment. To show the accumulation of the public business in that land district I will read an extract from the letter of Colonel Jennings, bearing date December 17, 1860. He says:

"I have examined about five thousand claims, and if those not examined will compare with those examined, will embrace about 2,400,000 acres of land. This land at $1.25 per acre would have been a neat little sum in the Treasury of the United States. An office in the receipt of that amount of money from the sales of public lands, the probability is there would be but little difficulty in obtaining appropriations for clerical aid, fuel, lights, and other expenses in the land office; but as Congress saw fit to donate lands to actual settlers in Oregon, it is fair to presume a consideration; if so, the Government is as much under obligation to perfect the title to their claims as if they had paid for the land in cash.

The additional labor growing out of donations is an excess of labor over and above the ordinary sales of public lands.

The Secretary of the Interior received vouchers from Colonel Jennings of the clerical hire authorized by him and approved these vouchers and made his recommendation to Congress at that time for payment. They were submitted to the proper committees; the committees in each House reported favorably. But unfortunately the bills never reached the action of the House and the Senate together.

Now again, after a lapse of a great many years, this venerable man once again appears before the Congress of his country and asks that this just and long-deferred claim shall be paid before he shall have passed off the scene of action. He is before you now. A bill has passed the Senate after being unanimously reported by the Senate committee. It has come to this House and been submitted to the appropriate committee and is now before the House with the unanimous indorsement of that committee. And I express the hope, Mr. Chairman, that this old man shall not again go from these doors without the payment of this just claim. And I express the additional hope in conclusion that the announcement may be wired to him to his far distant home on the Pacific shores that at last his country has done him justice, and after the lapse of over a quarter of a century that which was due to him has been placed back in his pockets, from which it was taken by his Government.

I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, this is a just and meritorious claim, as I regard it, for services rendered to the Government of the United States; services rendered pursuant to law, and for which the claimant has never been compensated.

I had occasion, during the Forty-eighth Congress, as a member of the Committee on Claims, to examine a claim from the State of Oregon, involving the facts presented in this report. It seems that under act of Congress approved August 18, 1856, the Secretary of the Interior was "authorized to allow, subject to the approval of Congress, such reasonable compensation, for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses incidental to said offices (registers and receivers) as he shall think just and proper, and report to Congress all such cases of allowance at each succeeding session, with an estimate of the sum or sums required to pay the same."

Pursuant to this law, on the 16th August, 1860, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued the following instructions to all the local land offices, in which he recited the above-quoted provision of law authorizing the expenditure for which this claimant now asks relief at our hands:

You will send on a statement showing the amount actually expended by you as a reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses over and above the allowance by said act of 1818 (the same simply referring to the salaries of the registers and receivers).

You will prepare a statement, in tabular form, showing the whole amount paid by you for this additional class of services, when and to whom, designating in each item the name of the party to whom paid and kind of service rendered, sending on the vouchers, with your affidavit verifying the statement.

Such data will enable this office to place the matter on a just and favorable basis for the consideration of Congress.

I do not desire to say anything further. The facts connected with this case are fully presented in the report, submitted by myself, that accompanies House bill No. 1297 of the last Congress; and unless opposition is made by some gentleman on this side I will not continue this discussion further.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be glad to ask my friend from Missouri whether, in investigating this claim, he found another claim of the same kind on behalf of the receiver. This claim is in behalf of the register, I believe.

Mr. DOCKERY. So far as I know the receiver has never presented any claim. This claim has been presented four times to this body. It has been four times reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands and has passed the Senate three times.

Mr. HOLMAN. My experience has been in such cases that both register and receiver make the same claim.

Mr. DOCKERY. So far as I have knowledge no claim has ever been presented by the receiver.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF LIEUT. JOHN F. STEWART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1732) for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas Lieut. John F. Stewart, late of Company A, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, in active line of service, was regularly promoted and appointed, and did serve faithfully as a second lieutenant of said company from July 29, 1865, until June 19, 1866; and

Whereas the company having been so far from headquarters during its entire period of service in the Northwestern Territories that he failed to receive his commission as second lieutenant, to which he was justly entitled, and failed also to receive the pay due him for his services as second lieutenant: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $992 to the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart, for his services in the United States Army, prior to his death, in the late war.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. REID, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1732) for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart, submit the following report:

That John F. Stewart was first sergeant in Company A, Fourth United States Volunteer Infantry; that on the 29th day of July, 1865, while his company was stopping at Saint Louis, Mo., while en route to Dakota, his said company was without a second lieutenant, and the said John F. Stewart was promoted to that rank with the understanding that he should receive his commission as such. He served faithfully and in a very acceptable manner in that capacity during the entire service of the company in the Northwest, and until its final discharge at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., on June 19, 1866. His captain, Samuel G. Sewall, makes affidavit that it was his understanding that Lieut. John F. Stewart was to be commissioned as such, and that he did all in his power to have his commission made out, but being so far from headquarters he failed to accomplish it. Captain Sewall further states that Lieut. John F. Stewart performed all the duties of the office of second lieutenant faithfully and satisfactorily, and was fully entitled to the commission which was promised him. The said John F. Stewart has since died.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in support further of the facts in this case I desire to read an extract from a letter written by the Adjutant-General to the Secretary of War, reciting the military history of the claimant:

The records of this office show that John F. Stewart was mustered into service as a private, Company A, Fourth United States Infantry Volunteers, October 12, 1864; promoted first sergeant November, 1864.

He is reported on muster-rolls of his company as a first sergeant present for duty, to June 30, 1865; for July and August, 1865, first sergeant, present with remark: "Provisionally appointed second lieutenant, by virtue of special orders No. 43, Headquarters, Northwest Indian Expedition, July 22, 1865." On all subsequent rolls he is borne as a sergeant "acting second lieutenant" to date of his discharge from the service June 19, 1866.

And in a letter written by General Sully this is stated:

When the Fourth United States Volunteers joined me they were very short of officers, so much so that it affected the discipline of the regiment. I reported this to my immediate commander, Maj. Gen. J. Pope, and by his direction made certain acting appointments, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The approval of the Secretary was never received by me, but as the services of a lieutenant were necessary, I thought it best for the service to allow first-sergeant J. T. Stewart to continue acting as second lieutenant.

He did act during that time as second lieutenant, and was paid only for services as sergeant. But he rendered the service which is stated by General Sully as necessary; and unless some one desires to oppose the bill I shall move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to inquire whether this case is not provided for by the general bill which we passed in the last Congress.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I think not.

Mr. BEACH. Will the gentleman state why this does not come within the provisions of that law?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I think that bill only provides for the case where the commission had been approved by the Secretary of War subsequently. In this case the commission was never issued at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. That applied only to those who had received commissions.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. He acted in that capacity, but it was so far from headquarters that he never got his commission.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether a large number of other bills of a similar character are not now pending before that committee.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I do not know that the chairman of the committee is present, but I will state my knowledge. So far as I know, there are only a few of them. I do not think, however, that that affects the merits of this bill.

The motion of Mr. REID, of North Carolina, was agreed to; and, accordingly, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

IDA A. RICHARDSON AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 178) for the relief of Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline Augusta Urquhart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasuary not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the following-named persons the sums specified, to wit: To Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, the sum of $12,714.40; to Ida A. Richardson, the sum of $20,479; and to Caroline Augusta Urquhart, the sum of $5,467.15.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. EDEN (before the reading was completed). Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] in charge of this bill will make an explanation of it I will withdraw the demand for the reading of the report.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this is one of that class of claims that arose under what was known as the "captured and abandoned property act." It is a claim, as it now stands, for about $38,000. These people, the Slocombs, lived in the city of New Orleans when it was captured by General Butler.

General Butler promised the people of New Orleans, before he took possession of the city, that their persons and property should be protected under the laws of the United States. After taking possession he imposed certain conditions with which the people should be required to comply in order to receive that protection; but this case of the Slocombs he made an exception. He gave Mrs. Slocomb and her two daughters permission to leave the city limits, and promised them protection for their property. That property was protected while General Butler remained in command, as he had promised that it should be. After he was relieved, and after General Banks had taken command, some eighteen months after the capture of the city, General Banks issued what was known as "General Order No. 202," and took possession of the real estate belonging to these people and of all their property then in the city of New Orleans. There were collected for rent, for insurance on some of the property that was burned after General Banks took possession of it, and for dividends on gas stock sums amounting in all to $38,000—in fact the amount was greater than that; but the committee have not thought proper to recommend the allowance of more than $38,000, because the excess was for personal property.

Mr. LONG. What do you mean by that?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Property that was lost through the casualties of war. The money so collected was turned into the Treasury of the United States by order of General Banks. He ordered it turned over to his quartermaster, and in that way it went into the Treasury, and it remains there to-day. As soon as the war was over and hostilities had ceased the President of the United States issued an order turning over to these people all their real estate, and they were put in possession of it again. The money collected as rents and as insurance and as dividends from gas stock was, as I have said, turned into the Treasury, and there it remains. Now these people have come here asking that this money be returned to them. The Committee on War Claims in the Forty-third Congress reported in favor of the passage of a bill refunding this money and a like report was made in the Forty-fourth Congress. In the Forty-fifth Congress the bill passed this House but did not pass the Senate. Again in the Forty-eighth Congress there was a report favorable to the passage of a bill similar to the one that I have now reported here. In the present Congress a bill has been reported in the Senate for the refunding of this money, and is now pending. The Committee on War Claims has reported to the House that Senate bill. This, Mr. Chairman, is a statement of the case in brief. It is simply a question whether the Government of the United States can afford to disregard the action of one of its public officers in time of war; whether or not the Government will attempt to hold the property of private citizens taken in that way. No court has ever decided upon this case, no proceedings have ever been had by which that money was turned into the Treasury. It has simply gone in there as thousands of other dollars went into the Treasury of the United States from the city of New Orleans, large amounts of which have since been returned to the owners. I know it is claimed that these people were disloyal, and that for that reason, perhaps, they ought not to be paid. I say, sir, that the Government of the United States can not afford to disregard the solemn obligation of its commanding general made at the time of the capture of the city. General Butler himself says that he made this case an exception. He gave these people his protection, and allowed them to go to their summer residence in North Carolina for reasons satisfactory to himself.

At a later date General Butler, in a letter which he wrote, stated that he would do all in his power to get their money and other property restored to them, but that he could not take a fee in the case; that it was outrageous the Government should so long have disregarded their appeals and should have held their money so long in the Treasury of the United States.

The Committee on War Claims were, so far as I know, unanimous, with one exception, in reporting favorably this bill. Having made this brief statement of the facts in the case, it seems to me there is no use of continuing the argument unless some one opposes it or can give some reason why the bill should not pass.

Mr. ROWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] for five minutes.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, having written the report made upon this case in the Forty-eighth Congress, I can possibly add something to the details already given by my friend from Kentucky. I desire to treat this question with absolute fairness; and I hope every member will listen to what I have to say.

Mrs. Slocomb and her daughters lived in New Orleans at the breaking out of the war. Mrs. Slocomb was one of those Southern women who dreaded the approach of the war, and she did what she could to prevent secession; but when secession was an accomplished fact she yielded her allegiance to the Southern confederacy. Being a woman of wealth, she subscribed her money liberally to the defense fund of New Orleans. Her only son entered the confederate army as an officer.

When New Orleans was captured, the subscribers to the defense fund of New Orleans were called upon by General Butler to contribute, in proportion to the amount they had thus subscribed, to a fund for the support of the poor in that city; and Mrs. Slocomb paid her proportion.

As is well known, the dealing of the Government of the United States with New Orleans was somewhat different from its dealings with other captured portions of the country, the purpose of the Government being to make at New Orleans a nucleus around which the loyal sentiment of the South might gather and help to build up the Government there. The proclamation of the commanding general contemplated that all people who remained at home and yielded loyal obedience to the Government of the United States should be protected in their persons and their property. Some time after that, Mrs. Slocomb and her daughter called upon General Butler to obtain his consent that they might go to their summer home in the mountains of North Carolina. General Butler asked them if they would take the oath of allegiance. Mrs. Slocomb said: "I have a son in the confederate army. While I opposed secession at the beginning, I yielded obedience to it afterward; and as I have now a son in the confederate army, my sympathies are necessarily with him. But if permitted to go to my home in the mountains, away from all the armies, I pledge you my word that I will do nothing in any shape or form in aid of the confederacy." General Butler took the proposition into consideration; and on the next day he wrote her a letter, in which he stated that he had an old mother at home who might some time fall into the hands of strangers and need a friend; that hoping that some one would do with her as he then proposed to do with Mrs. Slocomb, he gave her permission to depart to her mountain home in North Carolina, and assured her that her property in her absence should be as sacred under the flag as it would be if she remained at home. He thereby made a solemn contract with this woman (who had assisted the confederacy) by which she was permitted to depart. She departed under that contract. So long as General Butler remained in the city the contract was faithfully kept.

Mr. LONG. What was the consideration of the contract?

Mr. ROWELL. The consideration of the contract was her application to go out of the city and her pledge that out of the city and in it she would do nothing in behalf of the confederacy.

Mr. LONG. Was that a good consideration?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir; anything by which one party loses a right or the other gains one is a good consideration. She lost the right to stay there and protect her property by accepting his permission to depart. But for his engagement that her property would be secure she would have remained at home, and her property would have been safe, as it fell under the proclamation made and carried out with respect to all people who remained within the city. After she left the city General Banks took command. Then this property was seized. A building was destroyed upon which insurance had been taken, and the amount of the policy was collected.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I yield the gentleman such further time as he may desire.

Mr. ROWELL. Her houses and her daughters' houses were taken possession of and the rents collected; her gas stock was taken possession of and the dividends collected. Hearing of these facts, she, with her daughters, started back and tried to get inside the city, but General Banks's quartermasters refused to let her enter. As soon as she could get an agent to Washington and have her case presented an order was sent to New Orleans restoring this property to her.

I have now stated the exact condition of the case. I based my report in favor of this bill, as I now base my advocacy of it, upon the proposition that the Government of the United States can not afford to violate a solemn contract made by it, for General Butler represented the Government.

This bill was once passed; and it is fair to say it excited a great deal of discussion in the Northern press—not because of the merits of the bill, but because of the propositions of law embraced in the report accompanying the bill. In that report the right of this party to have her property returned was not based upon General Butler's contract and her departure from the city under it, but was based upon another proposition of law which I do not accept and which I would not support in any case. In this case when the commanding general, representing the Government, put in writing a proposition which, being accepted, put this woman's property under the protection of the flag, the question is whether the Government can violate that promise and take this property out from under the flag after General Butler had guaranteed it protection.

That is the whole of the proposition, and upon that proposition I support the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Is that the proposition upon which the committee reports the bill to the House and asks for its passage?

Mr. ROWELL. I have not seen the report, but the report in the Forty-eighth Congress was made by me.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] who has charge of the bill is that the principle laid down in the report—is that the principle upon which they ask for the passage of the bill?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The principle is, the Government of the United States having possession of this money in the Treasury, and it having gone there by indirection, it is only right it should be returned.

How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Forty minutes.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I desire to reserve it.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I feel a great degree of embarrassment in rising at this time to address the committee on the pending measure, which I am compelled by my convictions of right and justice to oppose. A novice on this floor, I find myself antagonizing the majority of the Committee on War Claims of the present Congress, a body of gentlemen for whose judgment individually and collectively I have profound respect. I find myself antagonizing the views of a majority of the Committee on War Claims of several Congresses prior to this one. I find myself antagonizing the views of the Committees on Claims of the Senates of the Forty-eighth Congress and of this one, and I find myself antagonizing the judgment of the majority of the Senate of the present Congress. This state of case has induced me to make an unusually careful and thorough examination of the matter with the impression that I must be wrong in the conclusion at which I first arrived. But each succeeding examination has only confirmed previous convictions, and I have found it impossible for me to agree with the report of the majority of the Committee on War Claims.

This is a bill for the payment of nearly $40,000 to Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb. The present claimant, Cora A. Slocomb, was not an original party to these proceedings, but now comes here as one of the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, who was one of the original claimants, and who was the mother of said Ida A. Richardson and Caroline A. Urquhart, who, with said Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, were the original claimants herein. The basis of the claim fully appears in the record of the case, and the facts are substantially undisputed, and the question for this committee and the House to determine is whether these claimants should, in law and justice be paid this amount of money in view of these facts.

In the year 1862, when Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler, in command of United States forces, took possession with his troops of the city of New Orleans, La., the original claimants, Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and her two daughters, Miss Ida A. Slocomb (now Mrs. Richardson) and Mrs. Caroline A. Urquhart (née Slocomb), were residents of that city, and had been such residents for some time prior thereto, and were the owners of a large amount of real and personal property in said city. Soon after the Federal occupation of the city by General Butler and his troops, in the summer of 1862, Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb obtained permission to go beyond the Union lines somewhere into the Carolinas, and within the confederate lines. It is also claimed that her two daughters obtained the same permission, but on this point, at least as to one of them, there is no evidence before the committee. Some of the evidence tends to show that she retired to her summer residence in the mountains of North Carolina, and some of it tends to show that she went on a visit to her sister somewhere in the Carolinas, but there is no positive evidence in the case as to where any of these parties were after they left the Union lines; and although this claim has been pending before different Congresses prior to this, none of these claimants have deigned to tell us where they spent their time between the time they left the city of New Orleans, in 1862, and the time they returned thereto, in 1865, after the war was substantially over.

At the time these parties went beyond the Union lines there was an order in force requiring persons in New Orleans to take the oath of allegiance to the United States, or else to register themselves as enemies or aliens. These parties, strange to say, were excused from either and all of these requirements, and General Butler says in a letter before the committee that this was the only exception (solitary is the word he uses) to these requirements. The case is wholly devoid of testimony or evidence as to what any of these parties were doing during their absence within the confederate lines, which lasted from the summer of 1862, they departing as soon as possible after the capture of New Orleans, until after the cessation of hostilities in 1865.

Before her departure from New Orleans, Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb having expressed some fears that her property might be interfered with during her absence, General Butler promised her that her property would not be interfered with if she were loyal to the United States and remained so. Some time after their departure Maj. Gen. N. P. Banks superseded General Butler in command at New Orleans, and in 1863, while he was in command, under an order issued from Washington in pursuance of a law of Congress, property situated in New Orleans which had been abandoned, and property owned by absent enemies, was seized for the purposes of the Army and for confiscation proceedings, and these claimants not having yet returned from their so-claimed temporary absence at their "summer resort in the mountains of North Carolina," under said order and for good reasons—at least then supposed to be good—their property was seized as abandoned property and as that of absent disunionists by the United States authorities.

This property was both real and personal. A considerable and perhaps the greater portion of this property, including the residence of the parties, was used for various military purposes incident to war and to the occupation of an enemy's country. That which was not so used was placed in charge of B. F. Flanders, esq., supervising special agent of the United States Treasury Department, who collected the rents thereon. As will hereinafter appear, before the courts had been reorganized in New Orleans so that confiscation proceedings could be commenced, the property was returned to claimants by order of President Johnson. Among this property was fifty-two shares of stock in the New Orleans Gaslight Company, belonging to said Cora A. Slocomb, and fifty-six shares of the same stock belonging to said Ida A. Slocomb (now Mrs. Richardson). While these claimants were still absent within the confederate lines four stores belonging to said Ida A. Slocomb (now Mrs. Richardson), and being a part of the property seized as aforesaid, and which had been insured in the Merchants' Insurance Company of New Orleans at $15,000, were destroyed by fire, and the amount payable on the loss, to wit, $14,300, was paid to Assistant Quartermaster McClure, of the United States Army.

At the close of the war all the said property so seized was, by order of President Johnson, restored to the possession of these claimants. However, no money collected as above stated, including the dividends on the said gas stock, was refunded, the same having been used for the purposes of the Government.

The following, then, is a summary of the claim of these memorialists:

Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb, for rents collected	$12,246 40
For dividends on gas stock	468 60
Total	12,715 00
To Miss Ida A. Slocomb (now Mrs. Richardson) for rents collected	5,675 00
Amount of insurance collected from Merchants' Insurance Company	14,300 00
Dividends on gas stock	504 00
Total	20,479 00
To Mrs. Caroline A. Urquhart (nee Slocomb) for rents collected	5,467 15
Total claim of all, and included in the bill (S. 178)	38,661 15

The foregoing matters are practically undisputed, but notwithstanding that be so, in my judgment no part of this claim should be paid, or the bill now under consideration be passed by the House.

It is claimed that the seizure and use of this property by the Federal authorities was without sanction of law, and consequently void. At the time this property was seized the late civil war was being waged with all possible ability on the one side, and malignity and energy on the other. No lawyer, I apprehend, will take issue with me that as a proposition of international law the property of belligerent enemies may be confiscated, and if such confiscation is in fact made by the military authorities, and if the action of those authorities shall be assumed by the sovereign authority, the confiscation is perfect.

Now all the acts done by General Banks at New Orleans and by the military authorities under his command have been substantially adopted and confirmed by the Federal Government. Congress some years since enacted a law exempting military officers from all actions and suits for any acts done in their military capacity, and assuming the defense of any actions brought against them for acts so done by them in their military capacity. So that without regard to the confiscation acts of the United States the property has been properly and legally confiscated. But it is said that our Government had, at the time of the happening of the occurrences now under consideration, confiscation acts. This is granted. But I submit that in this case those laws were complied with as far as under the then existing state of affairs was possible.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman allow a question here?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Did not the confiscation acts of Congress of August 6, 1861, and July 17, 1862, require proceedings in rem against property confiscated, and were such steps taken in this case?

Mr. LYMAN. Yes; I am coming to that. I have read all of these statutes and propose to have some of them read here this afternoon before I am done. I have already stated that all the requirements of the confiscation acts passed by Congress at the time of the seizure of this property had been complied with as far as the then existing circumstances and facts would permit. The property was seized, and such of it as was not needed for actual military uses at the time was turned over to the proper officers of the Treasury Department. Everything was done required by the confiscation laws to be done except the proceedings in the courts for condemnation, and these could not be had because the courts, broken up by the war, had not yet been reorganized when President Johnson granted a pardon to these claimants and ordered their property to be returned to them. Two thoughts are here suggested in this connection: First, there is a difference between confiscation and condemnation; this property was duly confiscated, though not condemned, in the exact manner provided by the law for the reasons already stated; and, second, the pardon of President Johnson did not relieve the claimants from any part of the penalty of their treason already executed, it only relieved them from any unexecuted portion of the consequences of their offenses.

I desire to call attention to the acts of Congress then in force, which to my mind settle conclusively that in view of the facts in this case the title to this property has fully vested in the Government of the United States. In order to a full understanding of these statutes and the decisions of the courts thereunder it should be borne in mind that on the 16th day of August, 1861, the President of the United States issued his proclamation declaring certain States, and among them the State of Louisiana, to be in insurrection. (12 Statutes at Large, 1262.)

Prior to the issuance of this proclamation, to wit, August 6, 1861, Congress passed an act, found on page 319, 12 Statutes at Large, of which sections 1 and 2 are as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That if during the present or any future insurrection against the Government of the United States, after the President of the United States shall have declared by proclamation that the laws of the United States are opposed and the execution thereof obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the power vested in the marshals by law, any person or persons, his, her, or their agent, attorney, or employé, shall purchase or acquire, sell or give any property of whatsoever kind or description, with intent to use or employ the same, or suffer the same to be used or employed in aiding, abetting, or promoting such insurrection or resistance to the laws, or any person or persons engaged therein; or if any person or persons being the owner or owners of any such property shall knowingly use or employ, or consent to the use or employment of the same as aforesaid, all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the same to be seized, confiscated, and condemned.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such prizes and capture shall be condemned in the district or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the amount, or in admiralty in any district in which the same may be seized, or into which they may be taken and proceedings first instituted.

The property in controversy here is clearly within the provisions of this act. At the time the same was seized, the proclamation of the President had long been issued. The original claimants herein owned the property; they had knowingly used it, and consented to its use, in aiding, abetting, and promoting the rebellion; it was seized and confiscated. True it was not condemned by the courts, because, as already stated, before the courts were reorganized so that could be done, President Johnson pardoned the offenders and returned their property. On July 17, 1862, long before the seizure of this property, Congress passed an act (12 Statutes at Large, 591) of which sections 6, 7, and 8 are as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person within any State or Territory of the United States other than those named as aforesaid, after the passage of this act, being engaged in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, or aiding or abetting such rebellion, shall not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation duly given and made by the President of the United States, cease to aid, countenance, and abet such rebellion and return to his allegiance to the United States, all the estate and property, moneys, stocks, and credits of such persons shall be liable to seizure as aforesaid, and it shall be the duty of the President to seize and use them as aforesaid, or the proceeds thereof; and all sales, transfers, or conveyances of any such property after the expiration of the said sixty days from the date of such warning and proclamation shall be null and void, and it shall be a sufficient bar to any suit brought by such person for the possession or the use of such property, or any of it, to allege and prove that he is one of the persons described in this section.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That to secure the condemnation and sale of any of such property, after the same shall have been seized, so that it may be made available for the purpose aforesaid, proceedings in rem shall be instituted in the name of the United States, in any district court thereof, or in any Territorial court, or in the United States district court for the District of Columbia, within which the property above described, or any part thereof, may be found, or into which the same, if movable, may first be brought, which proceedings shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases; and if said property, whether real or personal, shall be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, or who has given aid or comfort thereto, the same shall be condemned as enemies' property and become the property of the United States, and may be disposed of as the court shall decree, and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States for the purposes aforesaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the several courts aforesaid shall have power to make such orders, establish such forms of decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered by the marshals thereof where real estate shall be the subject of sale, as shall fitly and efficiently effect the purposes of this act, and vest in the purchasers of such property good and valid titles thereto. And the said courts shall have power to allow such fees and charges of their officers as shall be reasonable and proper in the premises.

March 12, 1886.

Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on last Friday I had stated what I claim to be the facts in the matter now under consideration (and which are substantially undisputed) that the money in controversy is the proceeds of captured and abandoned property of confederates, seized by Generals Butler and Banks at New Orleans during the late civil war.

I had endeavored to show that by international law, under the laws of war, this money had become the property of the United States, had been legally confiscated.

I was then proceeding in an effort to show that under the confiscation acts (so called) of the United States, enacted during the war of the rebellion for the seizure of abandoned property, this property had passed to the Government. I had called attention to the proclamation of President Lincoln. I had caused to be read the act of August 6, 1861 (12 Statutes at Large, page 319), and had shown that the provisions of that act had been complied with in all respects in which the then condition of the country would permit—in all except the manner of condemnation; that the property was confiscable, and that it had been in fact confiscated—not formally condemned, it is true. There is a difference between confiscation and condemnation. The latter is a mere form for determining the confiscable character of the seized property, and the form is not material. I had caused to be read the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Statutes at Large, page 591); and that the connection of what I have further to say may be the better preserved, I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of that act again.

The Clerk read sections 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. LYMAN. These provisions of law were in force when the gas dividends and rents in controversy herein were collected and when the insurance money was received, and, as it appears to me, cover the case completely. The owners of the property were engaged in aiding and abetting the rebellion. They had refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States; they departed its acknowledged jurisdiction voluntarily, and were domiciled within the confederate lines. The proclamation and warning of the President had been given. The property and its proceeds were used for the immediate military necessities of the Government or were turned into the Treasury of the United States. There were no formal proceedings in court, because there were no civil courts in which to proceed. The military authorities alone were in control there and then.

But this, as has already been suggested, did not in any way affect the confiscation of the property. That was already complete. It only affected the manner of condemnation. Prior to the seizure of the property of the claimants, to wit, March 12, 1863, Congress passed an act (12 Statutes at Large, 820), the first three sections of which are as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, from and after the passage of this act, as he shall from time to time see fit, to appoint a special agent or agents to receive and collect all abandoned or captured property in any State or Territory, or any portion of any State or Territory of the United States, designated as in insurrection against the lawful Government of the United States by the proclamation of the President of July 1, 1862: Provided, That such property shall not include any kind or description which has been used, or which was intended to be used, for waging or carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, ships, steamboats, or other water craft, and the furniture, forage, military supplies, or munitions of war.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That any part of the goods or property received or collected by such agent or agents may be appropriated to public use on due appraisement or certificate thereof, or forwarded to any place of sale within the loyal States, as the public interest may require; and all sales of such property shall be to the highest bidder, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, * * * And any person claiming to have been the owner of such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims; and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his rights to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, &c.

The provisions of this act also cover the case under consideration. Its provisions have been carried out as far as the surrounding circumstances would permit, and the owners of the property have never taken the steps therein required to recover the property or to establish a right thereto.

In the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton (2 Wall., 404), the Supreme Court of the United States held that the property of our enemies was liable to seizure, and that our statutes were for the protection of loyal citizens of insurrectionary States. I beg pardon for reading a portion of the syllabus of that case, as follows:

1. The principle that personal dispositions of the individual inhabitants of enemy territory, as distinguished from those of the enemy people generally, can not, in questions of capture, be inquired into, applies in civil wars as in international. Hence all the people of any district that was in insurrection against the United States in the Southern rebellion are to be regarded as enemies, except so far as by the action of the Government itself that relation may have been changed.

2. Our Government, by its act of Congress of March 12, 1863, to provide for the collection of abandoned property, &c., does make distinction between those whom the rule of international law would class as enemies; and, through forms which it prescribes, protects the right of property of all persons in rebel regions who, during the rebellion, in fact, maintained a loyal adhesion to the Government; the general policy of our legislation during the rebellion having been to preserve for loyal owners, obliged by circumstances to remain in rebel States, all property or its proceeds which has come to the possession of the Government or its officers.

The point in this case was whether the cotton in controversy was or was not "maritime prize." The court held it was not, and that its proceeds should be paid into the Treasury. And I ask attention to the last paragraph of the opinion of the court. The court says:

We think it clear that the cotton in controversy was not maritime prize, but should have been turned over to the agents of the Treasury Department to be disposed of under the act of March 12, 1863. Not having been so turned over, but having been sold by the district court, its proceeds should now be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in order that the claimant, when the rebellion is suppressed, or she has been able to leave the rebel region, may have an opportunity to bring her suit in the Court of Claims, and, on making the proof required by the act, have the proper decree.

And the first proof "required by the act" to be made, the jurisdictional fact, is that the claimants were and remained loyal.

It has been claimed that the Supreme Court has decided in the case of Planters' Bank vs. Union Bank (16 Wall., 483) that the seizures of property made during the time that General Banks commanded at New Orleans were illegal. I do not so understand the case. The Planters' Bank was a banking corporation of Mississippi doing business at Natchez. It remitted to the Union Bank at New Orleans, a banking corporation of Louisiana, large sums of confederate treasury notes, forwarded to it drafts and other claims for collections, and confederate bonds for sale, the collections and payments to be made in confederate currency.

In the course of these transactions the Union Bank became largely indebted to the Planters' Bank, and was so at the time the Federal forces captured New Orleans, Mississippi being still in rebellion. In August, 1863, General Banks required the Union Bank to pay to the authorities of the Government the balance due to the Planters' Bank. This was done in confederate notes as per the contract between the two banks. The action was brought by the Planters' Bank to recover from the Union Bank. In passing upon the validity of the order of General Banks the court did not hold that he had no right to seize the property of rebels at New Orleans; that question was not involved in the case; but only held that the confiscation acts did not apply to corporations, but to natural persons or individuals. "Under neither of the acts was the property of a banking corporation made confiscable." Says the court: "Both of them had in view the property of natural persons who were public enemies, or persons who gave aid and comfort to the rebellion, or held office under the confederate government, or under one of the States composing it. In no one of the six classes of persons whose property was by the act of 1862 declared confiscable was an artificial being included." Such was the point decided in that case. Not that enemies' property could not be seized, but that the confiscation acts applied only to natural persons, and not to corporations.

Much stress has been laid on what has been termed the contract of General Butler. There is no proof here that it purported to extend to more than one of the original claimants herein, but that protection was only to be under the laws of the United States while Cora A. Slocomb should spend the summer of 1862 at her summer residence in North Carolina. She went out of the Federal lines, entered the confederate lines, leaving her property in charge of her agent. Time went on, the summer of 1862 passed, the winter of 1862–'63 came and went, the summer of 1863 was nearly spent. The agent of the claimants has died. They have not returned and taken charge of their property. General Banks comes there and assumes command. He finds the property abandoned, and that it was owned by rebel sympathizers residing in the confederate lines, and he seizes the property under the laws of the United States. He acted in the light of the then existing facts. And because a year or more before General Butler, for some unexplained and unknown reason, had given to one of these claimants some kind of a promise, we are asked to declare that this Government has sacrificed all rights, no matter what might thereafter occur, and must take $40,000 out of her Treasury and pay it to aiders and abettors of secession.

This arrangement made by General Butler has been called a contract binding upon the Government of the United States. What an abuse of terms is this? There is not the first or a single element of a valid contract present. Where is the consideration? Where is the authority of General Butler to make such a contract? It is a misnomer to call it a contract. It was simply this, and nothing more: When the city of New Orleans was captured by the Federal forces General Butler issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "All rights of property of whatever kind will be held inviolate, subject only to the laws of the United States."

Afterward Cora A. Slocomb, having secured from him in some way the extraordinary privilege of going beyond the Federal lines and into the confederate lines without taking the oath of allegiance, for the ostensible purpose of spending the summer of 1862 at her "summer residence in North Carolina," also secured from him a personal repetition of the terms of that proclamation and nothing more. And now it is claimed that a contract was made by which the United States is bound, not only during the summer of 1862, and while General Butler commanded at New Orleans, but forever after, notwithstanding new commanders should be sent to New Orleans, notwithstanding new laws should be enacted, notwithstanding these claimants remained in the confederate lines and bore allegiance to the confederate government. You and I, my loyal fellow-citizens, are compelled by the rules of law to know what are the laws of our country; we are conclusively presumed to know them; but a citizen who rebels against his country, commits treason, and leaves his country for his country's good, is no longer held to such accountability. He has a contract with his Government, and while he is seeking to overthrow its laws they must afford him full protection. Absurd!

If the seizure of this property was lawful, that is the end of the question. But the claim of the beneficiaries of the bill now under consideration is largely based upon the alleged illegality of the seizure of the property. Now, this House will not entertain and pay claims over which any other tribunal has jurisdiction while such jurisdiction is not exhausted. If the theory of claimants be correct, and the seizure was wholly unlawful, then it is submitted that there is a full and adequate remedy for claimants in the common-law courts. They can collect their rent from their tenants. They can collect their gas dividends from the gas company. They can sue on their insurance policy and enforce their indemnity notwithstanding the payment to the Government. This has substantially been decided in Planters' Bank vs. Union Bank, 16 Wall., before cited; also, in 2 Wall., 404, and a tribunal (the Court of Claims) is especially established for cases of this kind by the act of Congress, 12 Statutes at Large, 821, already referred to; and while that is so claims should not be reported favorably by the War Claims Committee or paid by Congress on an ex parte showing.

Again, the evidence before the committee shows conclusively that these claims have all been submitted to both the War and Treasury Departments of the Government, and been rejected by both. It is the well-established practice and policy of this body and of your War Claims Committee to neither report favorably on such claims nor to allow them.

Again, any fair construction of the evidence herein establishes the fact that when these parties received back their property in 1865 they released, as a part of the transaction, all claims for damage and use, and all claims of every kind growing out of the seizure as against the Government. To put it in the mildest possible form, the implication and presumption raised are so strong that, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, they become conclusive, and these claims should not be paid. With this proof on file for so many years, and with so many able gentlemen advocating the claim as at different times have had charge of the interests of these claimants, if this presumption were not true, certainly it would long since have been rebutted.

But the most serious and weighty objection to the passage of the bill now under consideration is the undisputed disloyalty of the beneficiaries. Down to the time when the Federal forces took possession of New Orleans, under General Butler, they most intensely sympathized with, and were substantial supporters of, the rebellion, giving not only sympathy but their labor and money. The only son of one and the husband of another were officers of the confederate army from the first to the last of the struggle. There is no evidence that their sentiments ever changed. They retired at the first opportunity within the confederate lines, and remained there until those lines had ceased to exist, when, and not until then, after all hopes had ceased that the Confederate States government could ever restore to them their property, they procured a pardon and a return of their possessions. If they were loyal why did they require a pardon? But, as already suggested, this pardon could not in the least affect that portion of the penalty of the disloyalty of the claimants already executed. They were permitted to go beyond the Federal lines without taking the oath of allegiance or registering, and this course on the part of the then commanding general at New Orleans is wholly inexplicable to those who knew him there and were familiar with his declared and well-defined policy. Their disloyalty is uncontroverted. There is nothing here to show that they were not constantly and actively aiding the rebellion during their absence. Great stress is placed upon the fact that General Butler said their property should be protected. It seems to have been so long as General Butler commanded. But the next year, when General Banks was in command, a different state of affairs existed. Different laws had been enacted. We know not what information he had as to these parties. We can and ought to presume that he and the Treasury officials acted in a just, patriotic, and lawful manner in seizing this property when they did. The promises or assurances of General Butler, made the year before, under what circumstances and inducements we know not, cut no figure here.

The Committee on War Claims of this House have adopted a policy which the House has sustained and followed, that claims will not be allowed or paid which are made for property taken under the pressing exigencies of war for building forts, &c. That committee almost daily rejects and reports adversely to the House such claims of men who lived in the border and the insurrectionary States during the war, whose loyalty during that dark and trying period was undoubted, at a time and place when loyalty cost something, and whose all was frequently taken for the benefit and defense of the Government they loved. Their claims are not to be paid because it is said they owed a duty to their country in its time of need, and their misfortunes were but the result of that duty. And yet this House is asked to pay this claim for property taken for the use of the Government while war was flagrant from a confessed and undisputed enemy. We can not afford to do this. We can not afford to be thus ungrateful and unjust at the same time. If this bill shall pass and this claim be paid, hereafter my vote and voice will be given for the payment to loyal persons of all war claims against the Government made by such. No more unjust or undeserving claim could possibly be made than the one now under consideration, and if it is paid I shall endeavor to see that loyal men shall receive some compensation for the sacrifices they made that the Union might be preserved, while we are distributing our bounties to the disloyal. They shall no longer be punished for their loyalty while we reward treason, at least by my vote.

The passage of this bill would open a way to the Treasury of the United States which we can not afford, and set a precedent which will always rise to plague us. Claims amounting to millions of dollars from Louisiana and all the other insurectionary States are now held ready to present as soon as this one shall establish the precedent and pave the way, and I hope this House will pause and consider what we are about to do. During the past year and a half we have heard much in this country from one class of politicians (pardon the word; statesmen, I mean) of the immense surplus unemployed in the Treasury. Admit this class of cormorants, now through this bill knocking at our doors, to the feast, and this troublesome surplus will very soon dissolve in thin air. Another class of statesmen have been complaining that the silver was being hoarded in the Treasury, and not put into circulation. Here we have a solution of the problem. Patriots of the same ilk as these claimants stand ready and eager to circulate it all—among themselves.

Already the forces are being marshaled; even now the troops are being organized. To-day the lines of assault on the Treasury are being formed. They are in readiness to move in force as soon as the breach shall be made by the passage of this measure.

Only the other day, since this bill was reported from the War Claims Committee, this House adopted a resolution, on the motion of one of the most persistent advocates of this bill, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to this House the amount of money and property seized by Generals Banks and Butler during the times they commanded respectively at New Orleans. This report, which has since been received, is to constitute the basis of this new raid upon the Treasury.

This report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 26, ultimo, however, does not prove to be just what was expected. It does not cover such cases as this one. It does not cover money received from private parties direct. It only covers that found in the vaults of the banks. This report shows that in the vaults of the various banks was found by General Butler the sum of $262,534, and by General Banks the sum of $47,889 in par funds and $689,471.38 confederate funds. It does not tell us how much was seized from private individuals such as the claimants herein. So that while these raiders on the Treasury have not got all the information they hoped to get from their fishing excursion, they have got some light. This report was presented to this House on the 2d day of this month, and on the same day the bill (H. R. 6335) was introduced in this House as follows.

A bill to revive the right of action in the Court of Claims under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property acts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of action in the Court of Claims under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property acts be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended for one year from and after the passage of this act, including all cases of seizures under the said acts, or under color thereof, either before or after June 30, 1865, whether adjudicated by the Secretary of the Treasury or not, and without any regard to any statute of limitation.

By this bill it is proposed to open our courts for the collection of all the proceeds of abandoned and rebel property seized by the military officers of the United States during the late war. And the claim now under consideration is to be a test case, the key-note to which the music is to be set.

But, not content with this, rumors are rife all over this Hall, and are no longer a secret, that Generals Banks and Butler and their subordinate provost-marshals collected hundreds of thousands of dollars for which they never accounted to the Government of the United States, and taking the passage of this bill as the text and precedent, it will be claimed that the Government is responsible for every act of every man in the military service, whether it be right or wrong—whether it be by authority or not. They will say, and logically, too, that this claim now under consideration was paid because General Butler, in 1862, without authority, told these parties that their property should be protected under the laws, no matter what they may have afterward done, and that therefore the Government should restore all money and property which its military officers may have stolen even.

And this is not all. The flood will not come from Louisiana alone, but from all the States lately in insurrection. I have been informed by a member of this House representing one of the insurrectionary States other than Louisiana that there are similar claims, amounting to millions of dollars, from his State alone, all prepared and preserved and ready to be presented whenever such an opportunity shall be offered as the passage of the bill now under consideration. It will be taken as a favorable omen, and these claims of disloyal persons for property destroyed during the war all through the insurrectionary States will swarm upon us like the locusts of Egypt. The friends and holders of these claims will seek to realize the substantial benefits of what they will believe to be the full fruition of the oft-repeated boasts of their over-enthusiastic orators, that "the confederacy is at last firmly seated in the saddle," and that some degenerate sons of worthy sires have "come back to the house of their fathers to stay," with all the consequences that the terms imply.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I interrupt the gentleman from Iowa to ask how much more time he desires to occupy?

Mr. LYMAN. I shall probably occupy the entire hour, as I wish to finish what I have begun saying upon this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not wish to interfere with the business already completed to-day, and wish to ask the gentleman if he is willing to yield now for a motion that the committee rise. He will of course have the right to take the floor again when the committee resumes its session for this character of business next Friday. There are several bills to be reported to the House from the committee, and it is now within a few minutes of the ordinary time for taking a recess. I will ask him, therefore, if he will yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. LYMAN. I have been already requested to yield for the same purpose the gentleman from Illinois asks and desired to do so; and perhaps this is as good a place as any to yield for that purpose.

I am not very well posted in the rules of the House, but presume I will be entitled to the floor when the committee sits again for the consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the bill is called up again in the regular order.

Mr. LYMAN. Then I yield for the motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee rise and report the bills that have been acted upon.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report various bills with sundry recommendations.

HENRY AND THOMAS WASHBURN.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 398) for the relief of Henry Washburn and Thomas Washburn.

The bill was reported with an adverse recommendation, and was laid on the table.

B. JENNINGS.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 85) for the relief of B. Jennings.

The bill was reported with a favorable recommendation, and was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUT. JOHN F. STEWART.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1732) for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart.

The bill was reported with a favorable recommendation, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to present the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the House to the bill (S. 610) making appropriations for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
BARCLAY HENLEY,
W. H. WADE,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. MAHONE,
JOHN C. SPOONER,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement by the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal revenue, and other civil offices, and a United States jail, in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., submit the following written statement in explanation of the conference report:

The effect of the agreement of the conference committee is to limit the cost of the court-house building to $100,000, the amount fixed therefor by the House, instead of $125,000, as fixed by the Senate; and to limit the cost of the jail to $50,000, the amount fixed therefor by the Senate, instead of $25,000, as fixed by the House.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
BARCLAY HENLEY,
W. H. WADE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move the adoption of the report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. OUTHWAITE for one week, to attend to important business.

RECESS.

Mr. KING. I move that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock for the consideration of pension bills, under the special order of the House.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution under which this evening's session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Commitee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the class of business provided for in the order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order which has been read. The Clerk will report the first bill.

MARGARET A. POLAND.

The first pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5154) granting a pension to Margaret A. Poland; reported by Mr. ELLSBERRY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret A. Poland, widow of Alexander Poland, late of Leesburg, Loudoun County, State of Virginia, at the rate of $8 per month, to commence on the 27th day of November, A. D., 1863, and continue during the term of her natural life, said Alexander Poland having been killed by armed soldiers of the late Confederate States Government on that date for feeding Union soldiers, furnishing supplies to the United States Army, and because of his devotion to the Union, which pension shall be paid quarterly at the pension agency nearest to Washington, D. C., the arrears to be paid the date of the first quarterly payment of United States pensioners occurring after the passage of this act.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In the seventh and eighth lines strike out the words "commence on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1863, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES STONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 926) granting a pension to James Stone; reported by Mr. TAULBEE from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of James Stone, late a private in Company H, Fourteenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions of existing pension laws.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to amend, as follows:

Strike out the words "existing pension laws," and insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SANFORD GOIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5870) granting a pension to Sanford Goin; reported by Mr. TAULBEE from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask that this bill be passed over informally without losing its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM BRIDGES, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4389) granting a pension to William Bridges, jr.; reported by Mr. HAYNES from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Bridges, jr., of Grafton, Vt., late a private in Company I of the Twelfth Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NOAH B. BROOKSHIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H.R. 4644) granting a pension to Noah B. Brookshire; reported by Mr. O'HARA from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Noah B. Brookshire, late a private in Company B, Third Regiment of North Carolina Mounted Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM TURVILLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1275) granting a pension to William Turville; reported with an amendment by Mr. O'HARA from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Turville, late a private in Company H, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "Infantry," in line 7, insert:
"And that the pension be paid to his legally constituted guardian."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DINWIDDIE B. PHILLIPS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips; reported by Mr. TUCKER from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities incurred by and imposed by virtue of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Dinwiddie B. Phillips, of Fauquier County, in the State of Virginia, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM E. HARDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5259) granting a pension to William E. Hardy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William E. Hardy, late of Company D, Thirty-ninth Indiana Infantry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and to pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELIZABETH STEWART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5253) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart, widow of Thomas L. Stewart, late of Company E, Fourth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended that the bill be amended by inserting before the word "Thomas," in line 6, the word "Lieutenant," so as to make it read "Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart, widow of Lieut. Thomas L. Stewart."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. LOGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5000) to place the name of John W. Logan on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place the name of John W. Logan, dependent father of Clinton M. Logan, late a private in Company F, of the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. FLINT.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM CHRISTIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5024) granting a pension to William Christie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Christie, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers; said pension to commence from the date when his name was dropped from the pension-roll.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DR. WILLIAM H. SHEFFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4163) granting a pension to Dr. William H. Sheffield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Sheffield, late assistant surgeon of the One hundred and seventh Regiment New York Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended amending the bill by inserting in line 6, after the word "late," the words "volunteer acting;" so as to make it read "late volunteer acting assistant surgeon," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY ANIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5334) granting a pension to Henry Anin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Annin, late a private in the Forty-first Regiment United States Colored Troops.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended that the bill be amended by striking out, in line 6, the second "n" in the name "Annin;" so as to make it read "Anin," and by amending the title in like manner.

The amendments were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP DEREMER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Philip Devemer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip Devemer, late a private in Company B, Thirty-first Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended that the bill be amended by striking out, in line 6, the name "Devemer" and inserting in lieu thereof "Deremer," and by making a like change in the title.

The amendments were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry S. Cohn, and pay him a pension as second lieutenant of Company C, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, according to the degree of his disabilities, in lieu of the pension he now receives as sergeant of Company G, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. EDEN. If there is a report accompanying this bill I would like to have it read.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 909) granting a pension to Henry S. Cohn, having considered the same, submit the following report and substitute herewith:

Henry S. Cohn is now on the pension-roll as first sergeant of Company G, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and the object of the substitute herewith reported is to place him on the pension-roll as lieutenant in Company C, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Henry S. Cohn enlisted as a member of the Ohio La Fayette Guards in 1861, he at the time being only fifteen years of age, and continued therein for about four months, participating in the first Bull Run fight, when he was mustered out of service on account of expiration of term of service. He then enlisted in Fifth Virginia Regiment, and was appointed drum-major. Was honorably discharged therefrom in August, 1862, and at once joined the One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and at the organization thereof was appointed first sergeant of Company G, then at the age of eighteen years, and served in that capacity until December, 1862.

When at the battle of Hartsville, Tenn., his captain was killed, and the first and second lieutenants both mortally wounded, he took command of his company during the battle, and although his comrades were being killed at a fearful rate this gallant young soldier led his company on to the hottest of the battle until a bullet prostrated him, inflicting a severe wound, from which he has never recovered and for which he is now drawing a pension. During this battle his entire brigade was captured and carried away as prisoners, leaving him with his killed and wounded comrades on the bloody field, when the surgeons of the confederate army came on the field and carried him, with other wounded soldiers, to Church hospital, where he lingered for many months, until he sufficiently recovered to be removed to Camp Denison, Ohio, where he rejoined his command, and, although his wounds had not healed, but were constantly troubling him, he was transferred to Company C, One hundred and sixth Ohio Regiment, and was by regimental orders appointed lieutenant of said company, and served in that capacity from February until 22d day of May, 1863, when he was discharged on account of disability resulting from his wounds.

Your committee believe he is entitled to be rated as a lieutenant on the pension-roll, and therefore recommend that the original bill lie on the table, and report a substitute herewith and recommend its passage.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman doubts the propriety of this bill, I will state that I am personally acquainted with the beneficiary and know that the facts are as stated in the report. I have in my hand the regimental orders, which show that this young man acted as a lieutenant during the period mentioned in the report. These orders can be read if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] so desires.

Mr. EDEN. I do not wish it.

Mr. WILLIS. The only objection to this bill is that under it this gentleman will not get full justice. He ought to receive arrears, but is not urging an application of that kind.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH ANN MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5882) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Murphy.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3627) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth K. Gallagher, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Thomas F. Gallagher, deceased, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as of the 4th of November, 1883, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth K. Gallagher, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Thomas F. Gallagher, deceased, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps.

Mr. PETERS. Let us have the report read in that case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. PETERS. I do not ask that the report be read through.

Mr. MORRILL. Does this bill not grant arrears?

Mr. PERKINS. For two years.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out that portion of it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask that the remainder of the report be read, to see whether there is any good reason why these arrears should not be granted.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 3627, respectfully submit the following report:

The late Thomas F. Gallagher was mustered into the service July 2, 1861, at Camp Wright, with the rank of colonel of the Eleventh Regiment (Fortieth Regiment United States) Pennsylvania Reserve Corps. He was discharged on the 12th of December, 1862, for wounds received at South Mountain, Maryland, on the 14th September, 1862. He was promoted brevet brigadier-general on the 13th March, 1865.

Colonel Gallagher went into the service of his country a perfectly sound and healthy man. He contracted disease of the kidneys while in the service, and during the entire year of 1862 he was almost entirely unfit for service, yet he always was at his post. He was captured, together with nine of his regiment and all his field officers, and retained in Libby Prison until he was exchanged as a prisoner of war. He did not go into the hospital at any time, but always remained on duty, and after his release from prison he was nursed by his wife at a private house in Washington city until he was able to be removed to his home in Pennsylvania.

After his release from prison he received a "leave of absence" on account of his sickness, and while at home on furlough at that time he was treated for disease of his kidneys by Dr. J. E. Cook, his family physician, and it was the first time he was compelled to consult his family physician or take any medicine, at least while at home.

Dr. De Renneville, his regimental surgeon, was the one who treated him while in the service, and the doctor has since died, and also all the assistant surgeons at the time of Colonel Gallagher's service are dead, with, perhaps, the exception of one, and that one was not called upon by Colonel Gallagher, as his surgeon, Dr. De Renneville, was with him.

Dr. J. L. Cook, his family physician, certifies that he was the family physician of Colonel Gallagher for twenty-five years before his death; that he contracted the disease of the kidneys while away from home and while in the service of his country; that he went into the service a sound man; that after his discharge he was treated by him as his family physician for disease of the kidneys until the time of his death, and that his death was caused by the same disease.

His associates can not certify with any degree of certainty as to the exact nature of the disease that troubled him while in the service, although they do say that he was sick and often really unfit for duty.

Colonel Gallagher did not himself make an application for pension for the reason, as expressed by himself, "that many of the men needed it worse than he," thinking that he had for himself and his family sufficient of this world's goods. Therefore he always refrained from asking aid from the Government.

He died on the 4th day of November, 1883, leaving a widow and three children (the youngest a son aged sixteen years), and he departed this life in the full belief that his widow and children were well provided for, and with the honest conviction (as he frequently assured them) that the Government would protect them should any financial disasters come upon them.

Since his death all his property has been swept away, and his widow and children are left without a home, and indeed without even the necessaries of life. To-day his widow and children are without a home and on the very verge of starvation, and the widow is confined to a bed of sickness.

In accordance with the provisions of the statutes of the United States, in such cases made and provided, the widow of Colonel Gallagher could now (even if she would be successful in having her name placed upon the pension-roll) only receive an annuity and be debarred from receiving any arrearages, owing simply to the fact that her application had not been made prior to the passage of the said statute relative to applications for pensions.

Owing to the death of the regimental surgeon who treated Colonel Gallagher while in service, and the fact of his comrades in the service, who are living to-day, knowing so little or nothing of his exact ailment while in the service, and also the fact of Colonel Gallagher not having any hospital record while in the war, it would be impossible for his widow to make out a case for the Pension Department.

In view of the above facts and the deplorable condition of the widow of this gallant and meritorious officer, which your committee believe to be true in every particular, they unanimously and earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the words "as of the fourth of November, 1883."

Mr. MORRILL'S amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN A. STEWART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5884) to increase the pension of John A. Stewart.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1061) for the relief of Sarah M. Shearer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and conditions of the pension laws, the name of Sarah M. Shearer, widow of Cranford W. Shearer, late lieutenant-colonel of the —— Maryland Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NEWTON DAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 448) granting a pension to Newton Day.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Newton Day, late a private in Company B of the Fourteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out "Fourteenth" and insert "One hundred and fortieth."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ENOCH GOSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 549) granting a pension to Enoch Goss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Enoch Goss, late of Company D, Fifty-first Illinois Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL H. ROSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 524) granting a pension to Daniel H. Ross.

Mr. EDEN. That seems to include the question of arrearage.

Mr. MATSON. I move to strike out of the bill the words "the pension to date from the death of her husband," in the seventh line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSHUA L. MORRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5599) granting a pension to Joshua L. Morris.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joshua L. Morris, late of Company H, Third Missouri State Militia Cavalry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANTHONY HARSEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4114) granting a pension to Anthony Harsel.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anthony Harsel, late of Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by inserting the word "captain" before the name of the beneficiary of this bill, so that it will read, "Capt. Anthony Harsel." I thought I had done so in the bill, but find that while I made the change in the report I did not incorporate it in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEANDER C. MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4992) restoring Leander C. Mitchell to the pension-roll.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That Leander C. Mitchell, of Chariton County, Missouri, formerly on the pension-roll by certificate numbered 103982, but who has been dropped therefrom, be restored to all his rights under said pension certificate and restored to said roll. The committee recommend to strike out the name "Mitchell" and insert "Twitchell." Also amend the title so as to read, "A bill restoring Leander C. Twitchell to the pension-roll."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise and report these bills to the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I would inquire of the gentleman if he will not allow the committee to remain in session until we can finish the next two cases on the Calendar?

Mr. MATSON. I had agreed to allow this last case to be called because the gentleman who presented the bill desired to be absent next week. However, I have no disposition to be captious about it, and am willing that the next two cases, if they are important to the gentleman from Michigan, shall be taken up and considered.

H. P. M'FARLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3848) for the relief of H. P. McFarlin.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of H. P. McFarlin, late of Company I, Seventh Regiment Michigan Infantry.

The committee recommend the striking out of the words "place on," in the fourth line, and the insertion of the words "restore to."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY S. DOUGLAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2805) granting a pension to Mary S. Douglas.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary S. Douglas, mother of Thomas Douglas, late of Company C, Second Regiment of Maine Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar under the special order of the House, had instructed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the unfinished business coming over from the preceding session of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2022) to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, when that bill went over on the last Friday night session it was presumed by those who construed the rule at the time that the bill would come up for consideration this morning (Friday). I understand that after a conference the Speaker determined it would not, and could not be considered this morning. I therefore ask unanimous consent, and trust the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will concede it, that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and also on the passage of the bill and that it may go over for the present, which will throw it over until Monday morning as unfinished business.

Mr. MATSON. I am perfectly content with that, as it was what we intended to do on last Friday.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was the original intention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4389) granting a pension to William Bridges;
A bill (H. R. 4644) granting a pension to Noah B. Brookshire;
A bill (H. R. 5259) granting a pension to William E. Hardy;
A bill (H. R. 5000) to place the name of John W. Logan on the pension-roll;
A bill (H. R. 5323) granting a pension to George W. Flint;
A bill (H. R. 5252) granting a pension to John W. Thornton;
A bill (H. R. 5024) granting a pension to William Christie;
A bill (H. R. 5333) granting a pension to Edward L. Hill;
A bill (H. R. 5336) granting a pension to Benjamin S. Wolverton;
A bill (H. R. 5328) granting a pension to Noah Hoffman;
A bill (H. R. 5527) granting a pension to Emeline Crawford; and
A bill (H. R. 4002) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller.

MARGARET E. COCHRAN.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 908) granting a pension to Margaret E. Cochran.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, upon that bill, just for one moment, I desire to say that I have a letter from the brother-in-law of this lady, which sets forth the facts in the case; and I have not undertaken to occupy the time of the committee, and will not now, but simply ask in her interest that this letter be printed in connection with the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, February 27, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Thinking that a brief statement of the life and military services of Lieut. Col. Thomas B. Cochran may have some effect in securing an enlightened and just result in regard to the bill proposing a pension to his widow, Mrs. M. E. Cochran, I hastily prepare the following statement, much of which is personally known to you, and more possibly to Hon. Justice John M. Harlan, who was a personal friend of Judge Cochran, and was in the military service at or about the same time. At the breaking out of the war, Colonel Cochran was a lawyer in full practice in the town of Shelbyville, Ky.; a man of robust health, and was considered to stand at the head of his profession in the place of his residence. He was a man of decided character and always outspoken in his sentiments. His sentiments were so decided and his exertions so effective for the preservation of the Union of the States, that the late General L. H. Rousseau thought it of great importance to get him to take an active part in the military movements that were then being organized at Camp Jo. Holt, near the city of Louisville, and tendered him the command of one of the three regiments then being organized at that place. Mr. Cochran, whose modesty and diffidence were only equaled by his courage and devotion to right, suggested that his brother-in-law, Colona B. Board, who was a graduate of West Point, should be nominated as colonel of the regiment, he himself taking the position of lieutenant-colonel. These are the circumstances under which he entered the service. He at once entered into active service, went into camp at Nolin, served under General Sherman until he was relieved by General Buell; was actively engaged in the Tennessee campaign; was at the battle of Shiloh or Pittsburgh Landing; covered Buell's retrograde movement on Louisville (his regiment being cavalry); led Buell's advance in the campaign on General Bragg; participated in the battle of Perryville, &c. In the succeeding summer was stricken down with typhoid fever, taken to his home and nursed through what all of his friends at the time considered would be a fatal sickness. Before his health was fully restored he joined his command, but continued feeble from the effects of chronic diarrhea, contracted immediately after his return to duty, and from which he was never relieved during his life. His superiors finding him unfit for field duty placed him in charge of transportation at the city of Louisville, where he continued for some time. His physicians finally ordered him to quit the service, and in obedience to their requirements he resigned his commission, and under their advice made a trip to Europe for his health, which was somewhat improved thereby. On his return he undertook to resume the practice of law; was elected to the State senate, and, having removed to Louisville, was elected chancellor of the Louisville chancery court, the most important legal tribunal in the city.

During all this time his health was exceedingly delicate, and he was continuously troubled by the chronic complaint contracted in the Army. He again made a short visit to Europe, another to Cuba, with slight benefit in each instance. He continued his labors as judge of the court, when it was the wonder of his friends and the bar how a man reduced as he was physically should even leave his home. Finally his system could no longer respond to his great will, and a slight attack of erysipelas, which his family thought but little of at first, resulted in his death. For a long time prior he was physically but the shadow of his former self, reduced almost to a skeleton. He kept up only by that indomitable will and determination which were the leading features of his character. It may be proper to say to you that while engaged in the public service, both in his military and civil capacity, he had necessarily so neglected his private affairs that the moderate competency he had accumulated was dissipated, and his widow was left without provision. He never had children, and his widow is dependent on her own exertions for a support. She is now employed as a teacher in a female school at Mount Sterling, in this State. I have hastily sketched the outlines of his life since he entered the Army in order to supplement your own knowledge of his history. It does seem to me that this is a case where the Congress may properly intervene to carry out the principles of the general law, because of the fact that technical construction prevents the officers intrusted with the execution of the law from carrying out its true intent, namely, the fostering protection of the Government to the widow left homeless and poor by reason of the husband's services to the Government. The evidence filed with Mrs. Cochran's application in the Pension Department will fully sustain the facts as herein recited.

With great respect, I remain, yours, truly,

ROBERT COCHRAN.

Hon. A. S. WILLIS, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 6, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this day is set apart for general debate in Committee of the Whole House, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for general debate only. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] is recognized.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to enter upon an elaborate discussion of the silver question, but the interests involved are so vital to my constituents, and of such importance to the people of the country, I am unwilling this debate should close without stating briefly some of the reasons that will compel me to vote against the free and unlimited coinage of the present standard silver dollar.

My first objection to the proposed legislation is not that it gives to silver unlimited coinage, but that the dollar it proposes to coin contains less than 80 cents' worth of silver; that such a coin is dishonest, and not what it is represented to be. I am in every sense of the word a bimetallist, and I desire it distinctly understood that I am in favor of the use of the silver coin as a part of the lawful currency of the country. As has often been said, it is emphatically the money of the people, and any legislation that will tend to drive out of circulation either gold or silver, leaving only the other as money, would, in my judgment, bring ruin and disaster upon the country.

What our people want and are entitled to under the Constitution is an honest currency, a silver dollar that shall be fixed and stable in its value, whether it contains 412½ or 480 grains of silver; such legislation as will endow the two metals with an equality of value and maintain that equality. If the advocates of silver can bring into the House such a bill, or one that will substantially maintain the equilibrium between the two metals, I would not only vote for it but would vote to open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of the silver of the world. What the people want is an honest coin, a silver dollar worth, as compared with the gold unit, 100 cents; not a coin possessing a certain value to-day and another to-morrow; that will purchase a loaf of bread to-day and only half a loaf to-morrow; that is a legal tender to-day and scarcely bullion or merchandise to-morrow.

Sir, I do not think the expectations of the advocates of the Bland bill of 1878 have been realized. The promises made by its author and his associates have certainly not been fulfilled. While the measure was under consideration, not only upon this floor but at the other end of the Capitol, the country was told, yes, repeatedly told, that the silver dollar which it proposed to coin in such abundance would become more valuable than gold. It was then, as compared with gold, worth 92 cents. One of its most zealous and distinguished advocates, a colleague of the author of the bill, declared that the real danger was that the Bland dollar would prove too valuable to circulate along with the gold coin and we would be compelled to change the ratio of the two coins.

I call the attention of the committee to the remarks of almost every Member and Senator who spoke in favor of the passage of the bill. Over and over again they declared that the silver coin would rise to the value and dignity of the gold dollar; that the two coins would never part company, but circulate side by side, one the equivalent of the other.

James A. Garfield, then a distinguished member upon the floor of the House, said that if he could be assured of this fact he would vote for the bill; but, said he:

> Believing, as I do, and I shall rejoice if the future proves me mistaken, believing, as I do, that this bill will not bring the two metals to equality nor keep them there, that it will bring no relief to the suffering and distress which now afflicts the country, that it will seriously injure the public credit and thereby injure every citizen, I shall vote to lay the bill on the table.

And he so voted.

James A. Garfield was never nearer right in his predictions. It is eight years since the passage of the Bland bill over the veto of President Hayes and there has never been a day or an hour when the distance between the two coins has not been widening. Instead of becoming the equal of the gold coin, the silver dollar is worth less than 80 cents. Should its coinage be continued as provided by the Bland bill or as provided by the pending bill he is a very brave man who will dare to predict its intrinsic value eight years hence.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question but that Congress has power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Article 1, section 8 of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, but I submit it was never the intention of our fathers that the Government of the United States should make a business of it at the expense of its citizens. This is precisely what the Government is doing to-day. It goes into the market and purchases 80 cents' worth of silver, with which, and at an expense of less than 2 cents for coinage, it makes the dollar prescribed by the Bland bill, and this dollar they say is the dollar of the fathers. Suppose we go on coining this 80-cent piece until every dollar in gold is driven out of the country, we shall then require no legislation to take away its legal-tender properties, as we did the trade-dollar, for it will have none left; and after it has ceased to circulate with gold, suppose Congress shall refuse, yes, persistently refuse, to redeem it, as it has the trade-dollar, which, as is well known, contains 7½ grains more of silver than the Bland dollar.

Sir, the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof does not authorize the coinage of any such dollar. Regulate means to adjust, "to adjust by rule, to adjust by rule or method." The power conferred upon Congress was to go into the gold and silver market of the world, ascertain their relative market value, and fix the ratio accordingly. If you will examine the celebrated report of Alexander Hamilton, made with the view of the establishment of the Mint in 1792, you will find that such was the construction he put upon this clause of the Constitution. Says he, "I would give a preference to neither of the two metals for the money-unit."

In fixing the ratio of 1 to 15 in the act of 1792 his object was the establishment of their just equilibrium and relative value, and from that day down to the passage of the act of 1873 Congress always sought to preserve the equality and equilibrium of value between the two metals. As an illustration I cite the act of 1834, when the value of the gold unit was diminished.

Go into the markets of the world, ascertain the true and relative value of each metal, fix the ratio accordingly, and I will vote for the unlimited coinage of silver. Such a silver dollar will not be a falsification, but contain a hundred cents, an honest coin, and pass from hand to hand as such wherever good money is in use.

In discussing this question I am reminded of the coin known as the trade-dollar—a coin the existence of which is entirely forgotten by the Government at this time.

By the act of February 12, 1873, it was provided that the silver dollar of the United States should be a trade-dollar containing 420 grains of silver. Upon one side of this coin was stamped, emblematic of freedom, the word "Liberty" and the date of its coinage. Upon the other side the figure of the eagle, not any ordinary bird but the real American eagle, with the inscription "United States of America," "In God we trust," and "E Pluribus Unum."

Under this act and between the date of its passage and the passage of the Bland bill the Government coined $35,959,360. A large portion of this coin was exported to China, but the balance was taken by our own people. It was paid out in small sums to the industrial classes, and by them passed to the tradesmen of their respective localities. This coin was issued by the Government as money.

By its high-sounding inscriptions the Government declared it was worth a hundred cents, and the poor man, the mechanic, and farmer took it, relying upon this representation; yet notwithstanding all this, Congress took away its limited legal-tender qualities, took away its moneyed value and reduced it to merchandise. Between five and ten millions of this coin is now held by the people of my own State and the great State of Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, before the Government of the United States should be permitted to coin another 79 or 80 cent dollar, whether under the Bland act of 1878 or any other act, in the name of the poor men and women who took this coin relying on the representations of the Government that it was an honest coin, an honest dollar, I demand that it shall be redeemed, and redeemed at its face value. The Government owes this much not only to its own honor, but to the men and women who took it in good faith. It is said that it has been bought up by the banks. I care not who holds it, whether it be held by the rich or the poor, the individual or the corporation, the American citizen or the heathen Chinee.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman explain why the trade-dollar was of less value than the silver dollar containing eight grains less silver?

Mr. MILLARD. Because Congress gave the silver dollar the legal-tender quality and took it away from the trade-dollar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do you believe in giving the legal-tender quality to coin by law?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes. But when you give the legal-tender quality to any coin, in so far as it is not equal to the unit coin that part of it is fiat.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. My question is, do you believe in attaching the legal-tender quality to any coin by law?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes; if you make it equal to the unit coin.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Do not you give the legal-tender quality to the gold dollar without making it equal to anything?

Mr. MILLARD. No, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is not the legal-tender quality attached to the gold dollar?

Mr. MILLARD. What gives it the legal-tender quality is its intrinsic value.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And it has been made the unit of value, in violation of the very recommendation of Alexander Hamilton that you referred to in the first part of your speech.

Mr. MILLARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he is laboring under a mistake.

Mr. Chairman, the only way out of our difficulty is in the establishment of an international ratio between the two metals. Until that is done I am not only opposed to the free coinage of silver, but would fix a date for the suspension of its coinage as provided by the Bland act of 1878.

The act of 1878 has brought no relief to either capital or labor. By the provisions of that act the Secretary is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion, at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month, nor more than four million dollars' worth, and cause the same to be coined monthly as fast as so purchased into 80-cent dollars, and a sufficient sum to carry out the provisions of the said act is appropriated out of the money in the Treasury.

But why should the people of the country be taxed at the rate of at least $2,000,000 per month for the coinage of a coin that can not be forced into circulation? Every month there is taken out of the United States Treasury $2,000,000 in gold to meet the requirements of the Bland bill, and if the advocates of that bill could have their way the sum thus taken would be four instead of two million dollars.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What evidence have you that $2,000,000 a month in gold was paid out of the Treasury for bullion?

Mr. MILLARD. The act authorizes the payment of two millions a month as a minimum—from two millions to four millions per month.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does the act provide that it shall be paid in gold?

Mr. MILLARD. The practice of the Government has been to pay in gold, or its equivalent.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Oh, the practice of the Government; but what is the statute? Does that require payment in gold?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not think it does.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then why not pay it in silver?

Mr. MILLARD. If we are to have a silver dollar worth only 79 cents I say let us pay it in silver.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Did anybody ever refuse to receive payment for silver bullion in silver?

Mr. MILLARD. I do not think the Government ever offered silver for silver bullion.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is the trouble. If they would carry out the law faithfully they would.

Mr. MILLARD. I am not responsible for this administration.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But you are responsible for your own allegations in your speech.

Mr. MILLARD. Yes, sir; and I stand by them. I think my friend assumes a great responsibility if he undertakes to justify all the acts of the present administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I am not here for that business.

Mr. MILLARD. Since the passage of the act of 1878, as is well known, upward of two hundred and twenty millions of silver dollars have been coined and stored in the recesses of the Treasury. Of this sum less than $52,000,000 have found their way into circulation; the balance, $168,000,000, are still in the possession of the Government. The Government during the entire period of eight years has been able to keep in circulation less than one-fourth of the total coinage.

But it is said that of this $168,000,000 about $100,000,000 are represented by silver certificates. What are these certificates? They are not legal tender in payments between individuals. They may be included in the reserves of the banks and used in the payment of all public dues. It is said they are redeemable in silver, but none have ever been redeemed and none ever will be. Sir, the condition of our national finances do not justify an appropriation of $28,000,000 per annum, the sum required by the provisions of the act. From the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that the receipts of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, were $323,690,706.38—the receipts, all told, $24,829,163.54 less than for the year ending June, 1884; that the expenditures of the Post-Office Department alone exceeded its receipts by $8,381,571.41; that the surplus in the Treasury June 30, 1885, was $40,929,854.32 less than reported June 30, 1884. Sir, we shall require no horizontal reduction of 20 per cent. of the revenues to make the receipts of the Government equal its expenditures, for the same Secretary of the Treasury states the expenditures of the Government for the next year will exceed its receipts by at least $24,000,000.

In view of these facts, I submit whether the President is not right in his recommendations; whether the further coinage of silver as provided by the Bland act ought not to be suspended; whether the act itself should not be repealed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Now you are defending the administration.

Mr. MILLARD. Upon this question I am. I say the President is right.

Mr. Chairman, we have been repeatedly told during this discussion that this is a contest between the bondholder upon the one side and the debtor class upon the other, and that the passage of the Bland bill was the first blood for the debtor class. If it is meant by this that a debt contracted to be paid in honest money is to be satisfied in a debased and depreciated coin, then the contest has unquestionably been correctly defined. It is also charged upon this floor that the administration is engaged in a conspiracy with this same bondholder in setting aside and refusing to execute the laws.

Sir, the sins and shortcomings of the present administration are quite sufficient without adding this charge to its many offenses. But since the accusation comes from the Democratic side of the House it is barely possible it may not be without some foundation.

My distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in closing his remarkable speech declared that he would provide for free and unlimited coinage of silver, and would require the Secretary to pay out the silver in the Treasury as he has the gold in satisfaction of all public indebtedness. Sir, I have no more interest in the manner of the payment of the bonds of the Government than any other citizen. I am not a bondholder or the son of a bondholder; neither have I a gold or silver mine.

I do not know what others may think; but as for myself, for the Government of the United States to discharge its national debt in a debased currency, in a coin worth less than 80 cents, such an act would be partial repudiation, would ruin us in the eyes of the civilized world. On the 1st day of August, 1865, our national debt was $2,756,000,000 in round numbers after deducting cash on hand in the United States Treasury. On the 30th of June, 1885, it was only $1,485,000,000 after deducting cash in Treasury. Within twenty years we have paid off, and paid in honest money and according to the contract, $1,271,000,000 of the principal of the national debt and $1,890,000,000 accumulated interest.

Sir, let us not now, at this late day, go into the business of repudiation. I would not say but that, according to the letter of the statutes, the Government bonds, such as were issued or refunded prior to the act of 1873, may not technically be paid in standerd silver dollars, whether they are worth 80 or 100 cents; but such was not the understanding or intention of the parties who paid for them in gold or its equivalent. The silver dollar was not then and had never been employed as a legal tender for the payment of large debts, either public or private. At the time the debt was contracted the silver dollar as a coin of circulation had become obsolete. By the act of 1834 it was substantially demonetized. The average amount of silver dollars annually coined from 1834 to 1873 did not exceed $160,000. From the foundation of the Government down to the passage of the Bland bill the entire coinage of the silver dollar was less than $8,000,000, while the gold coinage during the same period was more than $1,000,000,000.

In view of these facts I submit whether the coin referred to in the several statutes was gold or silver, whether the parties who subscribed for the securities of the Government, purchasing them at par and paying for them in gold or its equivalent, as the case may be, suspected for a moment that the Government, when silver became cheap, would commence to coin it into cheap dollars by the hundred millions with which to pay its creditors. In my judgment, sir, if we should fail to pay them back their money to the strict letter of the bargain we would incur a disgrace that could never be removed from us. We would deprive this nation of an element of its greatest strength, its unquestioned credit. Principle and integrity forbid any other policy. It is the only way in which this Government can keep itself in a position to go into the market of the world hereafter as a borrower.

But this whole matter was settled by the act of February 12, 1873.

The act of February, 1873, provided that the gold coin should be legal tender for the payment of all debts in excess of $5. By this act the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains was abolished and the trade-dollar, containing 420 grains of silver, was authorized and made a legal tender for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment. Relying upon the provisions of the said act, many of the bonds then outstanding were refunded at a lower rate of interest and passed from hand to hand in good faith. Can such obligations, against the consent of the holder, be honestly paid off in a cheap and debased coin?

Sir, this is a matter of the greatest importance. It touches the character, credit, and good name of our Government. No nation can afford to deal otherwise than honestly with its creditors. The faith of the nation is pledged to the payment of its obligations not only according to the letter but the spirit of the contract. With nations as with individuals "honesty is the best policy." But this is not all; the agents of the Goverament employed to negotiate its bonds represented the interest to be payable in gold.

I think it will hardly be claimed by any one that a person purchasing the obligations of the Government, relying upon the representations of its duly authorized agents, would be compelled to accept payment other than as represented.

Our Government can not afford to be dishonest upon the theory that our bonds are held by the moneyed kings of Europe, that they are held by foreigners, for such is not the fact. The last official report of the Register shows that out of the $1,000,000,000 of registered bonds outstanding less than $12,000,000 are held abroad. It is a question between the Government of the United States and its own people—the middle classes, the farmers, the mechanic, the tradesman, and the day-laborer. More than 50 per cent. of all the outstanding bonds are held by the savings-banks and trust companies as security for the deposits of our industrial classes, men and women of small earnings, and who are dependent upon the labor of their hands for the support of themselves and families.

There are upon deposit in the savings-banks of the State of New York, a State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, $437,000,000, the larger portion of which is the accumulation of the toiling people of my State. Sir, they are the bondholders and gold-bugs whose implacable avarice so disturbs the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and if I speak with an unnatural fervor it is because the charge of the distinguished gentleman was unjust and uncalled for. I should be found wanting in my duty and patriotism were I not to defend their honor and integrity.

The creditor class of the country are not the bloated bondholders, the millionaires of our great cities, or the stock gamblers of Wall street. It embraces more of the poor than it does the rich and affluent. It is this class our laws were made to protect. It is in their behalf I speak, that they may be protected from the evils and misery attendant upon an unstable and dishonest currency.

Sir, a word further and I am done. It is said that the silver dollar, now being coined under the provisions of the Bland bill, is not a dishonest dollar; that it will buy in the market as much as you can purchase with the gold dollar. While this may be true how long will this condition of things continue? The fact remains that it is worth less than 80 cents; that it is not what it is represented to be; that 20 per cent. of its face value is a fraud and a fiction; that 20 per cent. of its stamp value is fiat, and yet I have heard it repeatedly stated that this is an honest coin, "the dollar of the fathers." I would respectfully remind these gentlemen that "the dollar of the fathers" was for nearly a half-century at par with the gold unit; that the silver dollar of Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson was a coin that circulated side by side with the gold dollar and maintained its equality for nearly fifty years.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I want to state to my friend that it would now, if it were not for the additional fiat element in the gold dollar.

Mr. MILLARD. The gold dollar has a fixed and permanent value, while the silver dollar is subject to constant fluctuation.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. All the difference between the gold and the silver dollar is made up by fiat.

Mr. MILLARD. The fiat added to the 79 or 80 cents worth of silver in the standard silver dollar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No, sir.

Mr. MILLARD. Twenty per cent. of the silver dollar is fiat.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to ask him a question. Was not the silver dollar worth as much as gold until it was discriminated against by being demonetized? Was not the amount of silver in the silver dollar equal in value to the gold dollar until the silver dollar was demonetized in 1873?

Mr. MILLARD. It was not at par with the gold dollar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Did it not have 3 per cent. more of value than the gold dollar?

Mr. MILLARD. In 1834 it had more than the gold dollar, and the gold dollar was reduced to restore the equilibrium.

Mr. BYNUM. But in 1873 was not the 412½ grains of silver in the silver dollar worth more than the 25.8 grains of gold in the gold dollar?

Mr. MILLARD. From the foundation of this Government until 1873, when the silver dollar was demonetized, we had not coined more than eight millions of silver dollars, while we had coined more than one thousand million gold dollars.

Mr. BYNUM. That is not an answer to my question.

How long, I submit, will it be before this Bland dollar will be rejected and repudiated by the people? How long will it be before the merchant and the tradesman will repudiate it by adding 20 per cent. to the price of their merchandise? Every commodity save the wages of the day-laborer will advance. He will be the first and last to suffer. Its repudiation and rejection has already commenced. No legal-tender enactment can prevent the making of contracts that require payments to be made in gold or its equivalent. It will be repudiated because it is not and never was what it is represented to be. Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State, eight years ago, in the Senate of the United States, then a distinguished member of that body, while discussing the right of the Government to pay its bonds in silver, declared that the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof did not mean the power to coin and falsify.

Mr. PETERS. If the purchasing power of the standard silver dollar is the same as the purchasing power of the standard gold dollar, what is the difference?

Mr. MILLARD. I answer the gentleman by saying that the only thing which keeps the silver coin in circulation is the gold dollar behind it.

Said Mr. Bayard, and I quote his exact language:

> Can you demand that a piece of coined silver worth but 90 cents shall be taken as the equivalent of a piece of coined gold worth a hundred cents? You undervalue one coin deliberately. You do not certify the truth as to its value, but you stamp upon that which you know at the time to be false.

Mr. Chairman, the currency of the country is fast drifting toward a silver basis. Only one of two things can save us from great financial disaster: suspension of the coinage, as provided by the Bland bill, or the establishment of an international ratio between the two precious metals. France has ceased to coin silver. The mints of Germany have been closed against its coinage for many years. England still refuses to enter into any arrangement or treaty with the United States and the states comprising the Latin Union by which an international ratio between gold and silver may be established. The chances of the establishment of an international ratio for the coinage of the two metals are not at all encouraging. On the contrary, a majority of the nations composing the Latin Union have recently entered into an agreement by which no more silver is to be coined.

Unless a common ratio between gold and silver can be agreed upon between the United States and England, France, and Germany the sooner the Bland act is repealed the better. History is sure to repeat itself, and the Bland dollar will become little better than the clipped coin of the seventeenth century. In recording the evils of that period in the history of England Lord Macaulay said that—

> It may well be doubted whether all the misery which has been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad parliaments, and bad judges was equal to the misery caused in a single year by bad crowns and bad shillings. When the instrument of exchange became thoroughly deranged all trade, all industries were smitten as with a palsy. The evil was felt daily and hourly in almost every place and by almost every class, in the dairy and on the thrashing-floor, by the anvil and by the loom, on the billows of the ocean and in the depth of the mine, nothing could be purchased without a dispute. Over every counter there was wrangling from morning till night. The workman and the employer had a quarrel as the Saturday came around. On a fair-day or market-day the clamors, the reproaches, the taunts, the curses were incessant, and it was well if no booth was overturned and no head broken. The simple and the careless were pillaged without mercy by extortionists, men of business were often bewildered by the confusion into which all pecuniary transactions were thrown, while the ignorant and helpless peasant was cruelly ground between one class which would give money by tale and the other which would take only by weight; the price of the necessaries of life, of shoes, of ale, of oat-meal rose fast; the laborer found that the bit of metal which, when received, was called a shilling, would hardly, when he wanted to purchase a pot of beer or a loaf of rye bread, go as far as a sixpence.

God grant that the misery which overtook the English people by reason of a debased and dishonest coin may never fall upon us.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman know it has been said of Lord Macaulay that as a historian he was as brilliant as a novelist and about as reliable?

Mr. MILLARD. Lord Macaulay was not only a brilliant historian, but he was always sound on finance——

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. From your standpoint.

Mr. MILLARD. And was followed by the English people.

The continued coinage of silver is demanded upon the theory that it will make money more plenty and relieve the wants of the distressed. Money never was more plenty than to-day. It is exceedingly abundant upon both sides of the ocean. Is it not an extraordinary phenomenon that the rate of interest is only 1½ per cent. at New York, London, or Berlin?

Since the passage of the Bland bill, as is well known, more than two hundred and twenty millions of silver dollars have been coined. Are the times any better to-day than they were in 1878? Is there any less want and suffering than there was then? We have an abundance of money, but no confidence; a million of workmen, but no work. Is labor better compensated to-day than it was in 1878? Scarcely a day passes that does not record the collapse of some great industry, throwing out of employment hundreds and thousands of men and women.

Mr. Chairman, give us a fixed and stable currency; establish an equality between the two precious metals, a ratio that will be adopted by the leading nations, the states comprising the Latin Union, and we will open our mints to the unlimited coinage of the silver dollar.

Give us a currency that will enable the laboring man when he goes to his work in the morning to know the compensation he will receive at night for his day's work; that the farmer when he sells his corn and wheat may know that the price he is to receive for it is good money and not subject to fluctuation.

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the great business interests of this country, in behalf of the nation's honor and credit, not only at home but abroad, in behalf of suffering humanity I protest against the passage of this unlimited free coinage bill.

I want to see the American people not only masters upon the land but upon the sea; her foreign mails and her commerce with foreign nations transported not only in American vessels but in ships built by American mechanics, in charge of American seamen, and sailing under the American flag.

I want to see our nation the grandest and the best the sun shines upon, and our people the happiest and most prosperous people in all the world. It is for this that I have ventured to speak at this time against a debased and fluctuating currency, a bill that in my judgment will bring nothing but want and misery to the homes and firesides of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON].

Mr. FUNSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am thankful for the honor accorded me in folowing the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

In discussing this question we ought to put aside all personal and local interests and to contemplate a subject of so much importance to the whole people with a desire only for the greatest good to the greatest number of our fellow-citizens. The statesman who can see only that which is for the interest of his locality is unworthy of the name of statesman. The man who advocates the coinage of silver because it enriches the people of his special locality only, and the man who advocates the coinage of gold solely because it is for the gain of his people, have many steps yet to take before they reach the high plane of true statesmanship.

The grand central idea which should be and which I hope is uppermost in the mind of every gentleman on this floor in the discussion of this question is fairness to all, whatever may be their locality or calling.

The first object of the quack who would foist his nostrums on the credulous patient is to frighten him into the belief that he is sick, whether he is or not. So the political quack places his hand upon the financial pulse of the country and gravely remarks that if we are not already sick we certainly will be very soon, for the superabundance of silver in the national arteries is fast expelling the gold from the financial system of the country.

Mr. Chairman, if that is one of the dangers against which we should guard let us see how imminent it is. Will the coinage of silver drive gold out of the country? According to the report of the Director of the Mint, in 1878, before the renewal of the silver-coinage law had made any perceptible impression, there were $244,000,000 in gold in this country, and according to the report of the Director of the Mint that two hundred and forty-four millions had increased in 1884 to six hundred and ten millions. Here was an increase of three hundred and sixty-six million in gold in six years, and that, too, in the face of the remonetization of silver, whereby $144,000,000 of silver bullion was converted into coin. That does not look like the coinage of silver drives gold out of the country, but it does show quite the contrary.

Now, if we want to go abroad for figures—and there are gentlemen who will not be convinced of anything without going to Europe—let us see whether the coinage of silver has driven gold out of France. France has $537,000,000 of full legal-tender silver coin in circulation, and with this wonderful amount of silver she has $848,000,000 in gold also in circulation, and she, with her bimetallic system, has almost as much gold as both England and Germany combined, in each of which gold alone is money.

Now, will the discontinuance of the coinage of silver cause gold to remain in the country? Let use see about that. From 1849 to 1860, a period of eleven years, there was coined of silver in this country only fifty and one-half million dollars, as shown by report of the Director of the Mint.

In all those eleven years there was coined only as much as is coined now in two years. If the coinage of silver is what frightens gold out of the country it certainly had nothing to frighten it then. But what are the facts? By an approximate estimate by the best authority, there was in those eleven years $1,830,000,000 of gold taken from the California mines, and of that almost fabulous production only one hundred and thirty-seven millions in all that time remained in this country. Thus we see, with almost no coinage of silver for a great nation, gold running out of the country like water through a sieve. These are facts which we place against the theories we have heard so much of and which are so often used to frighten the people into the discontinuance of the coinage of silver.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that the coinage of silver ought to be discontinued because the standard silver dollar is no longer as valuable as the standard gold dollar. Might we not with equal propriety urge that the coinage of gold should be discontinued because the standard gold dollar has become more valuable than the standard silver dollar?

The purchasing power of the silver dollar is about as great to-day as it has been at any time during the last fifty years, and I hold, sir, that their difference in value is as much the result of the advance in the intrinsic value of gold as it is due to the decline in the value of silver.

Professor Jevons, an eminent English financier, informs us that from 1809 to 1849 the intrinsic value of gold increased 145 per cent. The discoveries in California checked that advance. But it was only temporary. Those great mines have been exhausted, and gold has again started out with wonderful strides toward doubling its own value. Every year the demand for it in the arts is becoming greater. The fact alone that it has become dear and hard to get increases the demand for it for ornamental purposes. There are millions who use it for ornamental purposes who would not were it cheap. The world of men and women, struggling to rise above the hod-carrier, when they reach the first round hang gold trinkets on themselves as badges of their rank, and from that to the top round of wealth each strives to outrank his neighbor until the great bulk of the world's gold coin is fast turning into breastpins and watch-chains.

The Director of the Mint, by carefully gathered statistics, reported that in 1881 over $11,000,000 in that year were thus used in the United States, and at least seventy-five millions in the world.

When we consider the fact that the same authority gives the entire production of the world for the previous year at one hundred and six millions, we are not astonished that gold is fast becoming scarce and high and that it is placing itself out of our reach as a means of exchange.

The gradual and certain enhancement in the value of gold can be no better shown than by the report of the eminent German statistician, Dr. Adolph Soetbeers, in his report for a period of two hundred and seventy-five years—1600 to 1875. In a scale of 100 he placed the production of silver in the year 1600 at 66.2 and gold at 33.8, and in 1875 gold had gradually gained in relative production until it had reached 70.8 and silver dropped to 29.2. Now, notwithstanding this wonderful increase in the production of gold over silver, he reports that in the year 1600 gold was 10.12 times more valuable than silver and that in the year 1875 it had increased until it was 15½ times more valuable.

These figures ought to convince any gentleman on this floor of two things: first, that gold has advanced in value; second, that its value has been influenced more by the purposes for which it was used than by its production. We do not desire to conceal the fact that there is at present a wide difference in the intrinsic values of the two coins. But if we are to demonetize one or the other because they do not agree in value (of which I am not in favor), why shall it not be the one which has advanced in value beyond certain limits and become scarce and hard to get—to a degree that renders it insufficient as a means of exchange; and why not continue the one which has increased in quantity commensurate with the business and wealth and population of the country?

Population, which has almost doubled since 1860, demands an increased rather than a diminished currency.

Wealth, which has increased from fourteen billions in 1860 to fifty billions demands an increased rather than a diminished currency. Wealth per capita, which has increased from $514 in 1860 to $900, demands an increased rather than a diminished currency.

The industrial interests, which have increased from one hundred and forty thousand manufactories in 1860 to three hundred thousand, demand an increased rather than a diminished currency.

The unpaid net debt of the Government of $1,485,000,000, requiring 50,000 tons of silver to pay it, demands an increased rather than a diminished currency, and above all the wonderful mortgaged debt of the people of the West in justice demands that they should not be deprived of the honest means of paying those debts. Just as well might you go into their garners and declare that whatever they may have stored there should be sold at half price and that all their hard earnings of years should be shrunk accordingly. It would be cruelty, Mr. Chairman; it would be a crime in the sight of justice; and it would be no less a crime because high officials attempt to perpetrate it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the men who are demanding the change are not the poor who have been goaded and chafed with want and driven to the wall in the battle of life. Were it they who are demanding half the property of the rich, shrieks of indignant wrath would go up from behind iron-barred counters and from richly-curtained parlors against hungry, gaunt cheeks of want and desperation. But it is not they; it is the demand of Shylock, who already has the pound of flesh and now claims the blood. It comes from men who have no want, no desperations, who are far removed from the aching limbs of men weighed down with debt, who go half clad and poorly fed, man, wife, children, and all, that they may be able to meet the semi-annual demands of the interest-gatherer. It is the heartless demand of the rich for half the property of the poor. It is the demand of communists in gilded palaces. [Applause.] We are told, Mr. Chairman, that we must have gold to pay our balances in the world's trade. We are the richest and the most prosperous people on the face of the earth, and there can be no excuse for us having any great balances to pay, and it need not be so, unless through the bad management of our financial tinkers, who would deprive the people of the means of business among themselves. With all the advantages given us by our location, fertility of soil, richness of minerals, and mechanical and industrial energy of our citizens and the never-ending resources of the fertile minds of the American people, there should be millions in balances coming to us every year and not one dollar going out, except for such things as we can not produce ourselves.

If gentlemen would come down from their lofty eminence from which they are constantly viewing the world and look around among our own people and study and improve the resources of our own country their minds would be set at ease about our balances in trade with the world. We need no one on the lookout to tell us what the world is doing that we may do likewise—though such seems to be the vocation of gentlemen who do not understand the simplest rules of business at home. They have been telling us that England has abolished her protective tariff and that we must do likewise or suffer the dire calamity of exorbitant prices. We have steadily refused to do so, and yet no one has been robbed by high prices, but instead of which the world's commodities have grown cheaper every year in our markets; and under a protective tariff twenty years of prosperity has smiled on us greater than the world ever saw before.

Another class of statesmen now remind us that England has long ago demonetized silver and that we must do likewise or lose our share of the world's gold. Once we were foolish enough to be half-tricked into acquiescing in the senseless cry, the results of which are too fresh in the minds of gentlemen here and of the people to need recounting. I do not believe the great body of thinking people will weary themselves much about England or Europe getting our gold. Every intelligent man knows they can not get it without giving its full equivalent in something after paying the duties on which they can sell cheaper than we can produce. And every intelligent man knows too that if need be the duties on imports can be so arranged as to bring us as much gold from the monometal gold countries as may be needed to cancel their claims for gold on us. Mr. Chairman, we are not a nation of helpless creatures whose chief duties are to do as Europe does. We are strong and industrious and need ask no favors, and can devise as many ways to get gold from Europe as they can to get it from us.

The time is past for frightening us with Europe. We need to fear only our own inconsiderate actions and the sinister motives of the comparatively few who hold the great bulk of the gold of the country and desire to enhance its value by doubling the demand for it. If we maintain, as we should, the bimetallic system which our fathers established, and stop tampering with it and threatening to demonetize one or the other of the metals, whichever becomes the most plentiful, we will continue to have a stability of currency as in the past and a volume equal to the advanced business and increased population of the country.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that we can not have a stability of currency without the two metals co-ordinately. The fact that they do not at all times maintain a fixed value toward each other serves of itself as a check on the rise or fall of each, which thus preserves a stability which could not be secured otherwise. The advance in the value of gold is checked by the fact that silver at such times being the cheaper money supplants it as currency, or the advance in the value of silver is checked by the fact that gold at such times being the cheaper money supplants it as currency. Thus in case of the advance of either metal beyond its standard value it loses its use as currency and is reduced in value accordingly, the cheaper metal in either case advancing in value corresponding with its increased duties. Thus a self-regulating influence is kept up, which could not be without the two metals.

To increase or diminish the quantity of metal in the silver dollar until its intrinsic value reaches that of the gold dollar, which has been so frequently suggested, would be to destroy those equalizing influences, for in that event gold alone would have the measuring or purchasing power, and in fact gold alone would be money, and silver would be but a commodity representing its own value measured by gold; and under that system, as its own value increases or diminishes, or as the value of gold increases or diminishes, the quality of the silver dollar would have to be changed to suit the fluctuation of either metal, of which there could be no end.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman, the monetary system of the country is not bad. The thing for us to do is to let it alone. The threat which has been standing over silver during the last year has had a very perceptible effect in the way of its decline and in the way of the advance of gold.

Mr. Chairman, at least one-half the business of this country is done on borrowed capital. Men will not borrow with the prospect before them of having to earn two dollars to pay back the one which they borrow. Business is at a standstill. We look each other in the face and wonderingly ask what shall we do. I say stop tampering with the monetary system. Hew to the line laid out by our fathers almost a hundred years ago. Shut your ears to the twaddle about a rejected currency, or if need be examine the reports of the coin in the Treasury of the United States and you will find there eighty-six millions in net silver and one hundred and forty-four millions in net gold, and if the larger amount indicates the rejected currency then ask yourselves which is the rejected currency. Let it be known that the standard silver dollar will continue to pay a dollar of debt and to do a dollar's worth of business, and in my opinion what gold we may need will soon come around hunting employment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLARD asked unanimous consent to extend his time; which was granted, and he continued as follows:

After all, what the balance of the world may be doing is not of so much importance to us as a fair and wise management of our own internal affairs. What we want is improvement and development, and reliance on our own resources. We want confidence in our own country, confidence in each other—a confidence that we can take care of ourselves in the face of whatever others may do. Give us this, Mr. Chairman, and an abundance of coin from our own mines and an assurance that the laws under which we have had so great prosperity will be let alone and the eyes of the people will be turned to the front, and we will again enter the rich fields of prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, all matters relating to the monetary interests of our country are important, but the questions most engrossing public attention at present are:

Shall the coinage of standard silver dollars be suspended?

Shall there be free and unlimited coinage of silver? or Shall we adhere to existing law, which caused twenty-eight millions of standard silver dollars to be coined last year, and which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month nor more than four million dollars' worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly into standard silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver?

At the outstart I desire to state that I disapprove of the severe criticisms which have been made against the friends of suspension and the advocates of silver. These important questions should be discussed fairly and candidly and without passion or prejudice. I believe those who are for suspension of silver coinage, and those who are for free and unlimited coinage, and those who are for adhering to the present law are honest in their opinions and sincere in their utterances.

I respect the opinions of all, and particularly the opinions of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, both of whom are wise financiers and able statesmen. I am satisfied their recommendations are the result of careful consideration and sincere convictions and that they are prompted by what they believe will be beneficial to the people and best for the Government. From the commencement of the present administration I have been one of the most earnest supporters of the President, and I have watched with pride and satisfaction his wisdom, firmness, and patriotism, and I desire as far as possible consistent with my convictions to uphold and support his recommendations.

When our ablest and wisest men differ on great questions which involve the prosperity of the country and the harmony of the people hasty action is improper. There is nothing known to men so potent in solving difficult financial problems as time. At present there is great diversity of opinions among those who advocate a change in our monetary system or in the laws relating to coinage, and we should be sure that the welfare of the people and the good of the country will be promoted by the enactment of a new law before we do it.

I do not believe the coinage of standard silver dollars should be suspended.

Silver and gold have been the metals used for the coinage of money since the beginning of commerce among civilized nations. They come to us hallowed by time and indorsed by centuries. There were shekels of silver and shekels of gold in the days of Solomon's power and wisdom and we are told Abraham weighed to Ephron for the cave of Machpelah 400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. The Constitution of the United States recognizes the bimetallic system when it declares:

> Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

And when it declares:

> No State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

The first mint act was advocated by Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton and approved by George Washington in 1792, and it authorized the coinage of both gold and silver as full legal-tender money.

In the world of to-day the quantity of gold and silver in circulation is nearly equal, there being of gold $3,513,000,000 and of silver $3,750,000,000, and it appears as if God, in his wisdom, intended that these two precious metals should stand together and something like equal quantities of each be furnished.

The Secretary of the Treasury says in his report that "statisticians all agree that silver is 54 per cent. of the monetary metal of mankind, while gold is only about 46 per cent." We have in the United States 65 per cent. of gold and 35 per cent. of silver, and the report of the Director of the Mint for 1885 shows that on the 1st of July, 1885, the amount of coin in the United States was some $820,000,000, of which $542,000,000 consisted of gold coin and $278,000,000 of silver coin. The gold and silver bullion in mints and assay offices on July 1, 1885, and available for coinage, was $71,501,682, making the actual amount of coin and bullion in the country $892,500,519.

The report of the silver commission for 1877 shows the standard of money and the population of different countries of the world as follows:

SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

	Population.		Population.
Russia	76,000,000	Peru	3,400,000
Austria	36,000,000	China	400,000,000
Egypt	4,500,000	British India	237,144,546
Mexico	8,000,000
Central America	2,600,000	Total	768,944,456
Ecuador	1,300,000

DOUBLE-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Greece	1,400,000	France	36,200,000
Roumania	4,000,000	Belgium	5,100,000
Colombia	2,900,000	Switzerland	2,700,000
Venezuela	1,600,000	Italy	26,800,000
Chili	1,900,000	Spain	16,400,000
Uruguay	400,000	United States	50,000,000
Paraguay	1,200,000
Japan	33,000,000	Total	187,300,000
Holland	3,700,000

GOLD-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Great Britain	32,000,000	Sweden	4,300,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope, and Australian colonies	7,060,000	Denmark	1,800,000
Germany	42,000,000	Portugal	4,000,000
Norway	1,700,000	Total	92,800,000

It appears therefore that 768,944,456 of the population of the world use silver as their standard, and 187,300,000 use gold and silver as their standard, while but 92,800,000 people use gold only as their standard. If silver should be stricken down as money in the United States and all other nations who use it as money should do the same, two-thirds of the people of the world would have no metallic money; over one-half of the coined money in the world would be destroyed, and one-third of our own coin would be worthless. Therefore if silver has been used in our country since 1792 and has been the medium of exchange since the beginning of civilization, and is now used by nine-tenths of the human race, why should its coinage be stopped in the United States? No demand comes from the people for a suspension.

This country is not suffering by the annual addition now being made to our coin currency. On the contrary, in many localities the people are clamoring for more. The financial and industrial reports from all parts of the United States indicate that everything is improving on the situation of last year. Statistics show that the annual increase of population in our country is nearly 4 per cent., and the value of manufactured articles during the last decade increased nearly 3 per cent. per annum, and the principal productions of agriculture, such as wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco, increased from 5 to 10 per cent. To meet all this growing wealth and population we should have continued coinage of the precious metals.

The demonetization of silver in 1873 and the constant war made on silver from that day to this has caused a widespread belief that the suspension of silver coinage might ultimately lead to the demonetization of silver. If silver should be demonetized in the United States, where it has had its grand empire for so many years and where nearly one-half the silver of the world is produced, its fate would be sealed, and the signal for the degradation of silver throughout Europe would be given, and then bankruptcy and suffering and ruin would come to millions of people in order that a few capitalists and gold-owners might add to their gains and revel in their wealth.

But what reasons are given by those who wish to suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars?

They say that the silver dollar is a debased, depreciated, light-weight dollar and should not be imposed on the people, but they propose to use the silver already coined in the payments of debts.

Mr. Chairman, every standard silver dollar now in circulation, or now being coined at our mints, has the same amount of pure silver in it that has been in the American silver dollar from the first coinage in 1792. It contained 371¼ grains of pure silver at the time of the first coinage and it contains the same amount of pure silver now, and has more silver in it than the silver dollar of any nation in Europe. It contained 412½ grains of silver and alloy in 1837, and contains the same now.

When we consider all that has been done to disparage silver and remember how it has been assaulted and stabbed in the house of its friends, its present standing is a splendid evidence of its stability. In 1873 it was demonetized because they said it was worth more than gold and would not circulate; and in 1886 they desire to stop its coinage because it is worth less than gold and will circulate. The war made on silver has made an apparent difference in the value of gold and silver; but it should be remembered that gold, like silver, is one of the commodities of life, and its intrinsic value is subjected to exactly the same rigid, economic law of supply and demand. Gold was cheaper than silver from 1834 to 1873.

Thirteen years ago silver bullion was worth 103 cents in gold, now silver bullion is worth only 80 cents in gold. No one asserted then that the amount of gold in the gold dollar should be increased so as to make it correspond with the value of the silver dollar. The purchasing power of the silver dollar is the same now as the gold dollar, and silver bullion more than sustains itself in comparison with other commodities. If silver agitation should cease silver may equal gold in value in a few years. At present the purchasing power of the silver dollar is about 25 per cent. greater than it was in 1873, as is conclusively proven by the tables of the late Director of the Mint, Hon. H. C. Burchard, who shows an average fall of 26 per cent. on ninety articles between 1870 and 1885. If silver bullion was alone in its apparent decline this would indicate depreciation, but when it bears the same relation to all other commodities that it has always borne the margin between it and gold should be accredited to the rise in the value of gold.

Another reason alleged against silver coinage is, if the coinage of silver at present ratio is continued, gold will soon be driven out of our country, and we will be deluged with the unused coins of Europe, which are abundant there on account of demonetization. It has been seventy years since England demonetized silver, and there has not been the slightest current of old silver coins drifting toward this country. Germany had a large amount of silver money, estimated at five hundred millions of our silver dollars, when she demonetized silver in 1873; but her discredited silver coins have not been felt or noticed in our country, and our Mint reports show nothing to indicate disaster or injury to our finances from this cause.

In 1878, when silver was remonetized, we were warned with great earnestness by capitalists, Government officers, and members of Congress that the coinage of silver would drive gold out of the country and produce financial distress and depression. They said that according to the "Gresham law" "bad money drives out good money;" but these predictions were not verified. Gold and silver are both good money. They have circulated together, and neither has driven the other out. As has been well said, so long as the balance of trade is in our favor gold will flow into this country; but when the balance of trade is against us both gold and silver will go out of the country.

The following table, prepared by the Director of the Mint, shows the amount of gold and silver bullion and coin exported and imported during the fiscal years 1878 to 1885, inclusive, and proves conclusively that silver is not driving gold out of our country:

Imports and exports of coin and bullion into United States.

Fiscal years.	Imports of gold coin and bullion.	Exports of gold coin and bullion.	Imports of silver coin and bullion.	Exports of silver coin and bullion.
1878	$12,976,281	$9,204,455	$16,490,599	$24,535,670
1879	5,624,948	4,587,614	14,671,052	20,409,827
1880	80,758,396	3,639,025	12,275,914	13,503,894
1881	100,031,259	2,565,132	10,544,238	16,841,715
1882	31,377,054	32,587,850	8,095,356	16,829,599
1883	17,734,149	11,609,888	10,692,242	20,219,445
1884	22,831,317	41,081,957	14,594,945	26,051,426
1885	29,691,696	8,477,892	16,550,627	33,753,633
	301,025,100	113,744,843	103,914,953	172,145,209

From 1873 to 1878, while silver was demonetized, the exports of gold exceeded the imports of gold $123,754,210, an average of twenty millions per year. Since the coinage of standard silver dollars was resumed our imports of gold coin and bullion have exceeded our exports $187,280,257, and during the same period our exports of silver coin and bullion have exceeded our imports $68,769,745, and during the past year when so much was said against silver the wonderful exhibit is made that $18,214,804 more of gold coin and bullion was brought into this country than was taken out, and $17,212,680 more of silver coin and bullion was sent out of our country than was brought in.

Another reason presented in favor of suspending the coinage of silver is the enormous increase of silver from our mines and from the mines in other parts of the world. The Secretary of the Treasury shows the fallacy of this statement when he declares in his report that "gold from the mines of all the world has doubled in quantity within thirty-five years, silver doubling in the last one hundred years." So that if there is any cause for alarm as regards the increase of the precious metals it exists in the case of gold and not of silver. But this is not a valid reason because the present law only allows not less than two nor more than four millions of silver bullion to be purchased and coined monthly, and no matter what the production of the world may be this can not be exceeded.

A remarkable fact connected with gold and silver which is generally overlooked is the immense amount of each annually used in ornamentation, manufactures, and the arts. Mr. Burchard, the former Director of the Mint, fixes the annual consumption of the world in ornamentation, manufacture, and the arts at seventy-five millions of gold and thirty-five millions of silver. As the last report of the Director of the Mint places the annual production of gold in the world at $95,292,369 and of silver at $115,147,898, we have annually only twenty millions of gold and eighty millions of silver for money purposes in the whole world. Population and wealth are rapidly increasing and it requires but little wisdom to see that before many years have passed the entire gold and silver product of the world will hardly be sufficient to meet the ever-increasing demand.

Again, it is said by monometallists who have suddenly assumed to be friends of laboring men that the coinage of the silver dollar does great injustice to the laboring classes and that they should not be paid in silver. For nearly a quarter of a century these monometallists have been drawing the interest and principal on these bonds in gold, and this is a late day for them to appear in the rôle of philanthropists. There is about twice as much gold money in the United States as silver money. Why have not these gentlemen used their influence with those who have control of the gold to have laboring men paid in gold as well as silver?

The history of the past shows that laboring men, office-holders, pensioners, and soldiers are paid entirely with silver or paper money and that the gold is kept for the bondholders, although every bond they have shows on its face that the bondholders agreed as a part of their solemn contract to receive gold or silver coin of the present standard value for both principal and interest of their bonds. There is nothing in the statement that the laboring classes are injured by the coinage of silver. My observation is that they and most of us are glad to get silver. They well know that a standard silver dollar will purchase as much as a gold dollar and will now buy more cloth, cotton, bacon, sugar, and coffee, or other necessary article than it has done before in many years. They also know that if the volume of currency is contracted by stopping the coinage of silver times will be harder, money will be scarcer, and wages lower.

Again, it is alleged that our public debt should be paid in gold to keep our credit up to a high standard and that it is not just to pay our creditors in silver. If we desire to know how the public debt should be paid we should examine the contract and the law under which it was created. All the interest-bearing coin obligations of the Government now unpaid were issued under the act of July 14, 1870, except the 3 per cent. bonds issued under the act of 1881, and are payable either in gold or silver coin.

Every 5 per cent. bond has this inscription on it:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871," and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1881, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Inscription on face of United States 4 per cent. bond:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The question now is, shall the rights of the bondholders and of the people be adjusted according to the language of the contract, or shall the contract be again changed so as to enhance the value of the bonds?

There has been some strange legislation for the benefit of United States bonds in the last quarter of a century.

Bonds payable in greenbacks, on which the Government realized only 50 per cent., were made payable by a Republican Congress in 1869 in coin.

To still further enrich the bondholders at the expense of the people, in 1873 silver was demonetized, so that the bonds were then compelled to be paid in gold; but an outraged and indignant people arose in their majesty and power and elected a Congress, which in 1878 passed a bill over the veto of the President of the United States remonetizing silver and restoring its time-tried and time-honored power, and made the silver dollar of 412½ grains to pay a full legal tender for all debts public and private.

To remove all doubt on the subject of remonetizing silver and authorizing it to be used in the payment of the public debt, both Houses of Congress, by large majorities, adopted in 1878 the following concurrent resolution, introduced by Hon. Stanley Matthews, then Senator, and now an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pleged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coin of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued, or authorized to be issued, under said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Can anything be clearer or more easily understood?

Why should Congress compel the debtor to add more silver to the coin than he agreed to pay; and why should Congress stop the coinage of silver so as to make the dollar harder to obtain? Congress, by the authority granted in the Constitution, "coined money and regulated the value thereof," and contracts have been made pursuant thereto, and the right to pay according to the terms can not be justly or properly taken from the people.

To put more silver in the dollar will oppress the debtor; to put in less will oppress the creditor.

The debtor class of our country made their contracts with the belief that the law in regard to gold and silver would not be changed, and it would now be unjust to them to change the law or impair the contract.

I have been furnished a table which shows that the proposition to increase the bullion in the silver dollar so as to make it equal to the present value of the bullion in the gold dollar will add two thousand four hundred and thirty-eight millions of dollars to the indebtedness of the people of the United States.

Again, it is said in justification of suspension that we have a superabundance of silver coinage. This same cry was raised in 1878. At that time Hon. JOHN SHERMAN was Secretary of the Treasury, and he recommended that the coinage of silver be discontinued when the amount outstanding exceeded $50,000,000. He then thought that we could not carry at par over fifty millions of silver dollars.

Instead of fifty millions of legal-tender silver dollars two hundred and fifteen millions of silver dollars have been coined since 1878; and still the silver dollar is at par with the gold dollar. If his suggestions had been adopted there would have been $165,000,000 in silver withheld, which we now have either in the Treasury or in circulation. During every session of Congress since then efforts have been made to stop the coinage of silver. Mournful predictions have been made, but our commerce and our manufactures and our vast agricultural wealth and other interests make continued coinage necessary.

A careful investigation of our monetary situation and a comparison of our volume of gold and silver with that of other great nations will show that we have less silver and gold per capita than most of the great nations of the world. There is no immediate necessity for changing the present law under which silver is coined.

The report of the Director of the Mint shows that the total coinage of silver dollars to July, 1885, was $203,884,381, and of fractional silver $74,939,820, making total silver money in our country $278,824,261. From this we should deduct silver certificates for which the United States holds an equivalent amount of silver of the denomination of $10, amounting to $140,323,140, and fractional silver held by the Treasury and not in circulation, amounting to $31,236,899; leaving an aggregate of silver in circulation of $107,264,162. And if this is divided pro rata among the people of the United States it shows a silver circulation of less than $2 to the head.

In this connection I present the following statement, taken from the report of the Director of the Mint for 1884, of the per capita specie circulation in France, Great Britain, Germany, United States, and Holland.

Table showing the total specie circulated in France, Great Britain, Germany, the United States, and Holland.

[From the Report of the Director of the Mint for 1884.]

Nations.	Estimated population.	Date.	Gold.	Silver.	Per capita.
France	37,672,048	1881	$848,000,000	$596,900,000	$38 30
Great Britain	35,246,562	1881	583,500,000	95,000,000	19 25
Germany	45,235,061	1880	334,420,000	211,480,000	12 06
United States	50,155,783	1880	610,500,000	262,000,000	19 39
Holland	4,172,921	1883	28,000,000	57,000,000	20 37

These figures are not glittering generalities or unreliable estimates. They were prepared by the highest authority and can not be denied, and they show that the gold and silver circulation of the United States per capita is only half what it is in France, the same as it is in England, and less than it is in Holland.

Eminent statisticians say the amount of gold and silver in circulation in the world is, gold, $3,513,000,000; silver, $3,750,000,000, or 52 per cent. of silver to 48 per cent. of gold.

Now, as we have in the United States about $600,000,000 in gold and two hundred and seventy-eight millions of silver, total for 55,000,000 of people, nearly nine hundred millions, it will require over two hundred millions more of silver to be coined in our country to bring our proportion of silver to gold up to the world's ratio of silver.

Great Britain and Germany have demonetized silver, but the policies of these great creditor nations are dictated by the wealthy classes, who own vast estates and control immense amounts of capital and have large quantities of securities. The middle and lower classes have but little power in shaping financial legislation; yet such has been the depression and financial distress among the people of Germany and England that landlords, tenants, farmers, merchants, and peasants have organized into unions and are demanding the remonetization of silver. A bill passed the German Reichstag a few days ago looking to the remonetization of silver, and this subject is now agitating England very much. It is said that Great Britain holds bonds of other countries to the extent of $3,250,000,000 and Germany to the extent of $2,000,000,000. The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the United States is a debtor nation to the extent of $1,848,340,335. In addition to this, the public debt of States, Territories, counties, cities, towns, villages, and school districts of the United States is very large, and when we add the railroad debt of the United States we will have an enormous indebtedness estimated at $12,193,161,057.

The prosperity of the United States has been identified from the beginning with the bimetallic policy, and the interests of our country are irreconcilably opposed to the financial policy pursued by Great Britain and Germany. As a debtor nation it is not to our interest to have artificial augmentation of the price of gold at the expense of our silver currency. Our double standard benefits both the poor and the rich. Gold and silver both being legal tenders, gives stability to each and spreads the fluctuations of monetary supply and demand over the whole country. This double-standard system has not only been indorsed by centuries of experience but by many of our wisest and best men. Alexander Hamilton, in his report on the Mint in 1792, said:

> To annul the use of either of the two metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scant circulation.

Ex-Postmaster-General Howe, one of the commissioners at the international monetary conference held in Paris in 1881, said in an able speech:

> We seek a thrifty world, and it is our profound belief that no such world is possible, if its money is limited to a single standard.

And at the same conference ex-Senator Thurman, of Ohio, also one of the commission, in his speech for bimetallism, said:

> I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail, for I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most important feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone.

The amount of silver now being coined each year in the United States is less than 50 cents per capita, and at the rate we have been coining it since 1878 it will take about thirty years to coin as much per head as France now has in circulation, and it will take about thirteen years to bring the volume of silver coinage to the present amount of gold coinage.

Another additional reason for not impairing or interfering with the standard silver dollar is our relations with the great silver-using populations of the world. We are now reaching out for more intimate commercial and business relations with Mexico, Central America, Peru, and Ecuador, and they have silver alone for their standard; and if we wish to trade with Japan, Chili, Colombia, Venezuela, Paraguay, Uruguay, Holland, Switzerland, Italy, and Spain, which are double-standard countries, we must have both gold and silver. If the coinage of silver is stopped the value of silver money and of silver bullion will be much impaired, and gold being more in demand will increase in value, while every industry will be injured. There are three great industrial classes on whom the burden and the injury will be especially heavy, to wit, the wheat-growers, the cotton planters, and the silver miners. These are the greatest money-producing classes in our country, and no other country in the world can now successfully compete with them.

For many years England and Germany have purchased wheat and cotton in large quantities from our people. While gold and silver are on a parity they will buy in the United States, because they will get a better article and save money on transportation; but when the price of silver goes down 25, perhaps 35, per cent., these great countries will buy silver in the United States and ship it to the mints in India, where 250,000,000 people use silver as their only currency, and produce wheat and cotton by the labor of men who hire at 8 cents in silver per day. Our wheat export has already commenced falling off, and the production of wheat and cotton in India has greatly increased. It is claimed by English merchants that if they can buy our silver at 70 cents to the dollar they can lay down in New York at 70 cents per bushel wheat raised in India. Our country is the largest silver-producing country in the world. We produce annually nearly one-half of all the silver produced in the world, and Representatives should consider well before they crush or even cripple the great silver interest of our country.

The last report of the Director of the Mint shows that the United States produced in 1884 $48,800,000, or over 42 per cent. of the world's production of silver for that year. It is impossible to accurately estimate the actual investment in silver mines in the United States, but the author of the report just published on the mineral resources of the United States says it will perhaps reach $300,000,000, and might go to four hundred millions.

Over a hundred thousand persons are engaged in silver mining in our country, and over a half a million of persons are supported by silver mining. Cities, towns, and villages have been built and railroads and wagon-roads and tramways constructed in these mining districts, and civilization has been carried to the far West by brave men and women who are animated by that love of money which springs eternal in the breast of all classes, from the Wall street banker to the humble laborer in a Western mining camp.

It seems to me that neither logic, reason, nor justice point to the suspension of silver coinage at this time.

The representatives of the American people can not afford to stop the coinage of silver and thereby increase the debt burdens of their fellowmen, greatly injure the prosperity of the South and West, sacrifice millions of dollars invested in silver mines, still further reduce the price of grain and cotton, and bring hard times to millions of industrious, enterprising citizens.

Our country is now getting along very well. Buoyant feelings and brightening prospects are beginning to gladden the hearts of the people, and the blessings of peace, prosperity, renewed business, and closer fraternity are felt and appreciated throughout our land. Let nothing be done to blight or change the situation.

Plenty of money vitalizes and quickens the industries of a country, increases and develops resources, employs, happifies, and pays all who labor, and scatters the jewels of contentment among the people; but the existing law on the subject of silver coinage is broad enough and comprehensive enough to meet the demands of the present.

I have shown that I am not in favor of suspension of coinage, neither do I believe it is expedient to authorize unlimited coinage of silver now. Last year there was produced in the United States $48,800,000 in silver bullion. At present this is too much to be added each year to our volume of silver circulation. With free and unlimited coinage of silver, we know not how soon the whole silver product of the world would rush to our country to be coined free at our mints. It will be time enough to have free and unlimited silver coinage when our business population and the demands of manufactures, ornamentation, and the arts make it necessary.

At present I believe we should adhere to existing law, under which not less than two millions of dollars' worth of silver bullion nor more than four millions of dollars' worth of silver bullion are required to be purchased monthly and coined into silver dollars. We should also provide for the issuance of coin certificates of the denomination of one and two dollars in place of greenbacks of the same denomination, and these certificates should be redeemable at the pleasure of the holder in silver or gold. Whenever the surplus or balance in the Treasury, including amount held for redemption of United States notes, shall exceed the sum of $100,000,000, it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided in the joint resolution lately reported by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON], to apply such excess to the payment of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States which is payable at the option of the Government.

All existing financial conditions invite us to a conservative policy. A very short time may suffice to solve the financial problem that now confronts us and indicate clearly the course which we should pursue. When the members of the present Congress were elected, questions relating to the suspension of silver coinage and unlimited silver coinage were but little discussed, but before the next November election ample opportunities will be presented for the fullest and freest discussion of those subjects. In this great country where we have a government of the people, by the people, and for the people we will always be benefited by their cool judgment and conservative intelligence.

The prosperity of our country, and the success and happiness of the people are paramount blessings. Prosperity will open up wider fields and more magnificent views, and cause this great Republic to move on to the accomplishment of its grand destiny; in its valleys, mountains, hills, and plains, crowded and intersected by rivers and lakes; in its agriculture, commerce, manufactures, arts, and inventions are found the elements that make up a great nation, and the human mind can scarcely comprehend the grandeur and growth of our Republic if under wise statesmanship, proper economy, and a just administration of the Government its prosperity is not retarded.

I believe this prosperity can best be promoted under existing circumstances, by not taking either the extreme of suspension or the extreme of unlimited coinage.

I believe also that the success and happiness of the people will be best advanced if agitation of the silver question should cease and attention be turned to reforming the tariff, reducing the expenditures, restoring American vessels to the waters of the world, reclaiming the public lands that have been squandered on railroad corporations, lessening the taxes, and encouraging education in every part of our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I earnestly call upon the friends of free silver coinage to organize in order to force a vote upon the bill reported from the committee having jurisdiction of the subject. We have made several ineffectual efforts to fix a day for its consideration. It is believed by many that it is not intended to allow a vote to be taken if parliamentary tactics can prevent. The silver speeches heretofore made in this House, as we all know, have not been delivered in the presence of an actual consideration of the question. Being of the Committee on Coinage, and having joined in the minority report, I had hoped ere now to have had an opportunity to be heard upon that report. In view of all the surroundings, I am unwilling longer to remain silent upon a matter of the first importance to the people of this country.

Comprehensively considered, two propositions are presented, and from the acceptance of the one or the other there is no logical escape. The real issue is whether the coinage of the silver dollar shall be suspended, or made free and unlimited. There is no middle ground in this contest, and no room for neutrality. From my standpoint of observation it is, in a great measure, a struggle between avarice and popular rights. Nothing I may say is actuated by any feeling of ill-will to the rich.

I am glad that in this free country of ours the avenues to wealth are intended to be open to all. I honor that man who in response to personal thrift, financial foresight, and earnest effort has met with abundant honest reward, while I have no respect for the indolent whiner who envies the honorable success and prosperity of his enterprising neighbor. I care not how affluent a man may grow if it be not done by injustice and oppression to his fellows; but no man or set of men in this land has a right to be legislated into opulence. It is against the unwarranted encroachment and rapacity of the wealthy that I inveigh. The time has arrived in this country when the people must control or be controlled by the forces of associated capital, and nowhere is this thought more prominently suggested than in the question which now confronts us. I have no hesitancy in defining my position on this question.

Early after the organization of the Committee on Coinage I submitted a resolution to the effect that it was the duty of that committee to report to the House at an early day a bill looking to the free coinage of standard silver dollars. This was denounced by a leading Eastern journal as pernicious. I believed then, and believe now, that the only rational, economic, and scientific solution of the question is to be found in the re-establishment of the law as it was aforetime.

"Inquire for the old paths, and walk ye in them." I doubt if we are wiser, better, or more devoted to the interests of good government than our fathers were. They enacted and kept in successful operation free coinage laws for silver as well as gold, and no pernicious effects were observable; on the contrary we had a safe and stable metallic currency, under which the country prospered and the people were contented. These conditions obtained until we lost sight of the ancient landmarks, cut loose from the old moorings, and drifted out upon an unknown sea of reckless experiment.

Mr. Chairman, thirteen years ago the financial crime of the century was perpetrated against the people of this Union. It shocked the public conscience and aroused the righteous indignation of patriots throughout the land. It was said to have been covertly and surreptitiously committed. It was denounced as "a furtive and rascally act" and as "a deliberate and inexcusable fraud." It met with almost universal condemnation. In its wake followed widespread disasters and terrific evils. Panic, bankruptcies, paralysis in business, stagnation in enterprise, and infinite distress abounded. Silver was demonetized.

The lamentable results which ensued are too recent in the recollection of all men to require a fuller recital than a mere reference thereto in order to awaken the gloomy memories of that deplorable era embraced within the years of 1873 and 1878. Aside from conditions of war no half decade in the history of this Government is more memorable for business inactivity and industrial collapse. Prosperity fled our shores, and the shadow of gloom settled down upon us with a darkness that could be felt. We were then under the domination of the Republican party, and popular displeasure and criticism visited upon its head the responsibility and authorship of our troubles.

After five years of dearth and depression, in obedience to the sovereign demand of the people, with a singular concurrence of opinion and a notable absence of party division, Congress remonetized silver, and it was partially restored to its legitimate function as a factor in the money of the country. There were very few to be found then in our National Council who had the hardihood to resist the general requirement of the great body of the people for relief so obviously just and necessary. Public sentiment had just been forcibly formulated by a resolution which passed the General Assembly of Ohio in these words:

Resolved, That common honesty to the tax-payers, the letter and the spirit of the contract under which the great body of its indebtedness was assumed by the United States, and true financial wisdom, each and all demand the restoration of the silver dollar to its former rank as lawful money.

It is said that there were but four negative votes upon the passage of this resolution—three in the House and one in the Senate. On November 5, 1877, the original bill of the eminent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to authorize the free coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender quality passed the House of Representatives by a vote of nearly 5 to 1—163 voting for and only 34 against its passage. It went to the Senate and was there amended, among other things, so as to "authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month nor more than four million dollars' worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars."

On the 21st of February following the House concurred in the Senate amendments by a vote of 203 to 72. The bill was vetoed on the 28th of February. The Senate passed it over the veto by a vote of 46 to 19, and the House did likewise by a vote of 196 to 73. So it is perceived that it required five years and the clamor of the whole country to measurably rectify what was apologetically called an oversight or inadvertence by some, and characterized as a crime by others; and had then to be done over Executive objections. The knowledge of this fact, it seems to me, ought to operate as a caveat upon the minds of those who are in a hurry to now undo what little of good has been with such difficulty accomplished, and even temporarily suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars, under the plea and promise of subsequent renewal should necessity arise. This was all that could be accomplished at the time by way of remedial legislation, and was accepted by the House under protest. The Senate obstructed the essential purpose of the House bill—the free coinage of silver—stopped the full flow of patriotic endeavor, and restricted the quantum of coinage as contained in the amendment mentioned.

Notwithstanding the well-deserved and unmeasured denunciation which this cruel piece of mal-legislation (act of 1873) received at the hands of the country, and the bitter lessons of experience it taught the people, still there are some among us who have never acquiesced in even the limited restoration of silver coinage, and from time to time there have come to the surface alarming manifestations of a settled and determined purpose to turn back the tide of financial reform, block the rightful office and exercise of silver money and remand the country to the same distressing conditions which obtained in the period to which I have referred.

The monetary centers, the national banks, the owners of fixed incomes, the syndicates of wealth, the possessors of gold, almost every organized association of capital have been steadily and persistently creating, issuing, and distributing from the great sources of money power every conceivable instrumentality of influence and argument with which to control public opinion and direct the legislative mind in favor of the suspension of the silver coinage. Circular upon circular, resolution upon resolution, editorial upon editorial, looking to this object have found their way into every section of the country.

Who can estimate the power for mischief of the varied combinations of moneyed strength when directed by the promptings of greed? Dismal prognostication, persuasion, and menace in turn are part of the media which have been adroitly employed in this unhallowed warfare against the rights of the people. I heard on this floor in the last Congress the direst and most calamitous consequences predicted if silver coinage were not immediately discontinued; and yet we still live, even those of us who voted to continue it, and there is no verification of those lugubrious and pessimistic prophecies.

Mr. Chairman, the efforts of anti-silver advocates have not been without their effect. They have succeeded by some sort of cohesive attraction, in accomplishing an almost unbroken confederation and practical unification of all the elements of associated capital and the creditor class in opposition to the further coinage of the silver dollar. The American Bankers' Association, which held its convention in Chicago in September of last year, resolved—

That it is the sense of this convention that the coinage of silver dollars under the compulsory law of 1878, is detrimental to the best interests of the people and dangerous to the welfare of the Government, and that the law should be immediately suspended, and remain inoperative until an international agreement with leading commercial nations shall give substantial assurance of the future relations of gold and silver as money.

This edict of the money-kings has been promulgated with conspicuous energy. There are very few bondholders and plutocrats who have not taken up this refrain and proclaimed it wherever their voice could be heard or their influence exerted, and credit-bearers are rare who have proven indifferent to its behest. There was one remarkable exception to the common spirit and general trend of the arguments and utterances of that convention, which has impressed itself upon my mind as being so honest, liberal, patriotic, and philanthropic, embodying such sound wisdom and practical philosophy, as to merit perpetuation; and with a supreme respect for its logic and unselfishness I here incorporate in my remarks portions of the address of Mr. John Thompson, president of the Chase National Bank of New York city:

We now have had twelve years of warfare over the two precious metals, one party contending for a single (mono) gold standard, the other party contending for the continuing of the double standard. It is a contest between debtor and creditor. The advocates of the mono gold standard commenced the trouble. In 1873 Germany having obtained a thousand millions of gold from France (indemnity money) undertook to substitute gold for silver. At the commencement of this movement silver was at a premium, but the natural effect of supply and demand soon followed. The German silver overstocked the London bullion market; this, together with the absorption of gold, caused a violent parting of the market value of the two metals. Following the lead of Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and this country, demonetized silver, France, Belgium, Spain, and Italy stopped coining it, and in July, 1876, $4 of gold was equal in the London bullion market to $5 of silver. In 1878 our Congress ordered the purchase and coinage of two millions of silver per month, this being about one-half of the output of our mines.

* * * * * * *

Gold as money is practically unknown by the people; they handle silver and paper money only. If the paper money is redeemable in coin, then it is equal to coin and is more satisfactory than the coin itself.

The debtor class is ten to one of the creditor class; the mortgagors are numerous as compared with the mortgagees. The debtor knows full well that the conversion of silver into merchandise, instead of being monetized, will fully double the burden of his debt.

* * * * * * *

Congress will not demonetize silver. It always has been and will continue to be money.

The effort, now in full force, to flood the country with fractional coin will soon load the merchants with money which the banks will refuse to take except at a discount, to cover the expressage to some subtreasury, and when there it will be redeemed in silver dollars or silver certificates.

Finally, if the determination to demonetize silver is persisted in, silver will be the standard and gold will be merchandise.

I regret the necessity of this plain talk, and do sincerely hope that some measure can be adopted to perpetuate the double, or bimetallic, standard. The equities, as between debtor and creditor, should not be violated. The wheels of prosperity should not be blocked by the conversion of one-half of the basis of our currency and credit into mere property. The extra liability of suspending specie payments should not be incurred.

* * * * * * *

I do assert that neither precious metal can be thrown into mere merchandise without causing stagnation, depression, and, finally, monetary revolution—a doubling of the purchasing power of the monetized metal and a corresponding cheapening of the price of all property.

The laborer is appealed to to help repudiate silver. I would like to see the laborer who has discovered that a gold dollar buys more bread and butter than a silver or paper dollar. He wants prosperity and employment that he may get the dollar.

Has any one heard of any convention of men of small means and limited transactions, of debtors, of laborers, of the varied and multiplied sons of toil, of those who eat bread by the sweat of their brows, asserting that the coinage of silver dollars is "detrimental to the best interests of the people and dangerous to the welfare of the Government," and demanding the cessation thereof? Do the masses share in these apprehensions? Have any of them asked their Representatives here to demonetize silver and contract the volume of currency? If there be such, let them speak, for them have I offended.

' After the lapse of nearly a quarter of a century during which period the country has been inflicted with Republican misrule, after the vicious act of demonetization in 1873 and the calamities which succeeded it, after the lessons of experience their history furnished, after all we have seen and suffered, learned and lost, it has been reserved for the close of the good year of our Lord 1885—memorable for the accession of the Democratic party to the control of the Government—to furnish the eminently suitable and all appropriate opportunity for an authoritative recommendation to the Federal Legislature to suspend the coinage of silver dollars! That recommendation is met by a bill for free and unlimited coinage.

Mr. Chairman, all men can not see alike, and a spirit of toleration for the opinions of others should prevail. I will not permit myself for one moment to question the motives or impugn the objects of any gentleman here, or any person high in national authority with whom I may be unable to agree upon any subject of legislation or matter of public policy. One man has as much right to his opinion as another. I love to be in harmony with the leading representatives of my party and in sympathy with an administration begotten by that party, but I will never support any measure which does not upon its own merits commend itself to my judgment and conscience, I care not by whomsoever recommended.

I find myself at irreconcilable variance with the recommendation of the President and the officers of the Treasury Department upon the subject of silver coinage. It is to be regretted that the necessity presents itself in the orderly discussion of a tangible proposition formulated and regularly submitted for definitive solution, for Democrats to criticise and oppose the line of policy suggested and advised by the first President their party has had for twenty-five years. It is a painful and unpleasant duty and one which ought to be undertaken in no spirit of indecorous haste.

No circumlocution, however, can disguise the existence of a well-defined hostility upon the part of many Democrats to the coinage policy of the present administration, no management can suppress this truth, and no mere partisan motives or apprehensions should deter us in suitable season from a firm, fitting, and faithful avowal of our convictions. When the interests of the country are involved, it is better that the common good should be conserved, even if an administration be censured, no matter what political party it represents. It is better that legislators be patriots than partisans.

To sustain the propriety of free silver coinage involves a reply to the reasons assigned for its suspension. It is said, among other things, as an argument in favor of suspending the coinage of the silver dollar, in substance:

That the Constitution does not justify the present purchase and coinage of silver dollars, it being beyond the amount needed for a sufficient circulating medium, and that the desire to utilize the silver product of the country should not lead to a perversion of the power "to coin money;"

That no necessity exists for the present silver coinage because only about fifty millions of the silver dollars have actually found their way into circulation, and the custody of the residue has entailed a considerable expense for the construction of vaults for its deposit;

That monthly two millions of gold are paid out for two millions or more of silver dollars, and the continuance of this is liable to result in the substitution of silver for all the gold the Government owns applicable to its general purposes;

That the hoarding of gold has begun, and the time approaches when the two coins will part company;

That gold will go to a premium, and the banks and rich speculators will make handsome profits;

That the laboring men and women of the land will find that the dollar received for the wage of their toil has sadly shrunk in its purchasing power, and the wage-worker must inevitably lose;

That a contraction of the circulating medium will result in consequence of gold quitting the field of circulation;

That the silver dollar is only worth 80 cents, and that we ought to regulate our action on silver coinage by the pleasure and conduct of the Latin Union;

That we now have all the silver dollars needed, and suspension being declared, if any more be at any time required their coinage may be renewed;

That prosperity hesitates and capital timidly shrinks because of the dangers and uncertainties surrounding this question; and

That labor lacks employment and the vast army of the unemployed appeals for a safe and stable currency.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to make some analysis of these propositions, and while it may be beyond my capability to refute the arguments involved, still I shall feel that I have in a measure discharged my duty to my constituency and the country when I declare my radical dissent from the conclusions reached and policy suggested, and as best I can express the reasons which shall control my course.

It is not pretended by the most ardent pro-silver man that the present law is what it ought to be, or by any means free from objection. The purchase of bullion belongs to the power of coinage, and may derive its authority from the means to carry that power into effect, and, if so, is not obnoxious to the Constitution. I believe that all the teachings and traditions of the Democratic party emphasize and crystallize the doctrine that gold and silver are the constitutional money of this country. Our Government started out on that theory. I will not now consume time by questioning the wisdom or correctness of the laws and decisions of courts which have sustained the issuance of paper money, nor the necessity and policy involved in those matters which have been put at rest by supreme judicial decision.

I content myself with the statement that if the framers of our Constitution contemplated and intended gold and silver to be money, it is a principle, and hence indestructible. I do not believe that Congress has now or ever had the constitutional power to demonetize silver or to cripple and hinder it in the proper exercise of its function as money. Daniel Webster said:

I am certainly of the opinion that gold and silver at rates fixed by Congress constitute the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace this standard.

The power is conferred upon Congress to determine the necessity and extent of coinage, and if Congress should say that the coinage of silver dollars shall be absolutely free and unlimited there is no appeal from its decision, it being the peculiar and exclusive province of Congress to determine the question; and no tribunal could or would interfere in disturbing the legitimate prerogative of the law-making power. Unrestricted authority being vested in Congress "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," when its judgment is asserted in favor of the present or increased coinage of silver dollars it is immaterial to any other power in this Government as to what conditions and motives actuate and impel Congress, and all inquiry thereinto is precluded. If it should conclude, as is the fact, that the United States produces nearly one-half of all the silver in the world, and that this precious domestic product ought to be utilized; that the people need the addition to the circulating medium of any number of silver dollars, whether it be in actual circulation, or represented in silver certificates, or confined in Treasury vaults, and should enact its conclusions into law, what power is competent to decree that it is a misuse or perversion of Congressional authority? If Congress should attempt to displace silver as a standard of value I believe, with Daniel Webster, that it would be a violation of the Constitution.

To suspend the coinage of silver, to obstruct its monetary use, to antagonize, in any way, the successful operation of its fiscal office, is, in my judgment, to displace the silver standard of value in proportion to the extent of such obstruction. The lesson learned from past legislation, the unmistakable purpose of gold monometallists and anti-silver agitators, as manifested in all their words and acts, logically conduce to the conclusion that the entire demonetization of silver as a full legal tender is sought to be ultimately accomplished; nor will their efforts in that direction cease until their object is consummated or they are so overwhelmingly defeated as to show the utter futility of further exertion. And now that they have thrown down their gauntlet it is but the response of courage and duty upon the part of those who favor the constitutional rights of silver to accept the challenge and sound no truce until their cause be fully established, which will only be done when the concurrent and equal coinage of the two metals at the mints of the Government is finally assured. The quicker and more decisive the conflict the better it will be for the country.

We find from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency (page 67)

that on November 1, 1885, the amount of coin in this country was $839,129,143, of which $550,927,783 was gold and $288,201,360 was silver. The estimate of the Director of the Mint on January 1, 1886, increases the amount to $847,104,020, or gold, $533,810,148, and silver, $293,293,872, with gold bullion of the value of $72,923,721, and silver bullion of the value of $4,611,078, making a total metallic stock of $924,638,819. The coinage of gold is free and unrestricted; no war has ever been waged against its coinage, although "as money it is practically unknown by the people" and has but little circulation among the masses, they preferring "to handle silver and paper money only." There is no suggestion of complaint against its continued and uninterrupted coinage, or to the effect that too much of it has been coined, or as to the existence of any constitutional objection.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a necessity for the continued coinage of the silver dollar, because every dollar coined will add that much more to the volume of money required for our large and rapidly increasing population and their commercial wants; because multiplied millions of public and private indebtedness can be discharged in such dollars, and every addition thereto increases the debt-paying capacity both of the state and the citizen. The Comptroller of the Currency, in his report (page 18), says:

Through the operation of the act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character, the circulating medium issued by the Government of the United States has been increased in the sum of $213,259,431, of which $49,442,089 in standard silver dollars are in the hands of the people, and $70,670,570 of like coins are in the Treasury of the United States, in addition to $93,146,772 of said standard dollars, which are represented by silver certificates in the hands of the people, and which can be converted into standard dollars at the pleasure of the holder, and are receivable for customs, taxes, and all public debts.

The actual increase of the volume of money in the hands of the people, then, is $142,588,861, or something over $2 per capita, with which to pay taxes, discharge indebtedness, transact business, and purchase the necessities of life. It follows that continued coinage will still further increase the circulating medium—an end, in my judgment, to be devoutly desired, and in the interest of the great mass of the people.

We learn from the Director of the Mint (Report, page 30) that on July 1, 1885, there was of gold coin in the Treasury $179,952,890, in national banks $90,758,847, and in other banks and general circulation $271,462,890. We are not informed in this statement as to the respective amounts in the other banks mentioned and in general circulation. It may be safely assumed, however, that nearly one-half of all the gold coin in the United States is controlled by the banks. I have searched with some diligence and have been unable to find any authentic estimate of the gold coin in actual circulation in the hands of the people. We have an abundance of statistical information, elaborate discussion, and official recommendation upon the silver question.

From the above statements as to the amounts, form, and location of our metallic money it is not obvious that gold has much the advantage of silver in point of real circulation and actual monetary use by the body of the people, and besides there is comparatively little silver held by the banks, the amount in round numbers being only about $12,000,000. It is not astonishing, in view of these facts, that the banks should be unfriendly to silver coinage and look with lively interest to its suspension.

I believe there is a necessity for the continued coinage of the silver dollar because it is essentially the money of the great majority of the people. All over the country silver will settle the transactions and adjust the business of men in moderate circumstances more conveniently and satisfactorily than any other quality of money. In speaking of fractional coins the Secretary of the Treasury says that "in the bulk of human transactions where money passes silver has no rival." The application may be made with equal and it seems to me greater force to the silver dollar, because of its unlimited legal-tender quality. The great business classes who carry the exchanges of the country are not the only people whose preferences, convenience, and interest ought to be consulted.

No sort of money is better adapted to popular necessities, uses, and conditions than silver, and it can not be successfully controverted that everywhere in the country away from the cities and centers of wealth the people prefer silver; and I think it would be difficult to find a farmer, a mechanic, or wage-worker of any kind who would not rather have, and could not more readily utilize in all their ordinary and practical financial affairs, ten standard silver dollars than a ten-dollar gold piece. The laboring men of the country would not object if instead of the less than five dollars in silver per capita now extant in this Government we had fourteen dollars as is the case even in France. I believe we ought to continue the coinage of silver, because to stop it would be not only to limit and contract the volume of money, but it would be to disarrange the prices of all commodities, to injuriously affect the markets, to add to the purchasing power of gold, to curtail the rewards of labor, to augment the wealth of gold owners to the detriment of the rest of the people, to benefit the creditor at the expense of the debtor, to magnify the fortunes of the rich and take from the substance of the poor.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that silver can and will circulate among the people if it be allowed a fair opportunity. Whenever it is fully known and appreciated by those in authority that the people are absolutely determined that it is now and ever shall be in this country the full equal of gold, shall not be discriminated against, but made to assert and enjoy its proper office in the payment of national as well as private debts, then it will circulate. Let it once be affirmatively shown and realized that the people who make Presidents and Secretaries and Congressmen are thoroughly in earnest and will utterly repudiate those who refuse to do their will on this question, and it will circulate. Let the decree go forth from the mighty sovereignty of this country that bondholders, credit-bearers, and goldites can not dominate the policy and conduct of legislation, and it will circulate. Let Treasury officials be made to discharge bonded indebtedness of the United States payable in silver with silver, or, if preferred, with silver certificates, and it will circulate. Let them quit borrowing gold of national banks on the plea of strengthening the Government's gold reserve for the payment in gold on the national debt, and pay out some of the millions of silver on hand in discharge of such debt, and it will circulate. Remove the obstructions at headquarters, consisting in discretionary power or otherwise, and it will circulate. Give it an equal chance with gold and it will circulate.

I have yet to see a workingman who says there is no necessity for silver coinage, or that the silver dollar will not circulate, or hear him complain at any superabundance of standard dollars. I live nearly 1,700 miles from this Capitol, and remote from any mint, and yet I saw standard silver dollars of 1885 in circulation in my county before coming here in November last, and have not seen a gold coin since my arrival in this city. I never saw any man decline to receive a silver dollar, but have frequently heard the request for silver in exchange for gold and paper money. It is by natural selection the people's money and constitutes as statisticians agree 54 per cent. of the monetary metals of mankind. But "the custody" of silver dollars "has entailed a considerable expense for the construction of vaults for its deposit." What expense? How much? How many vaults have been built, where, and at what cost? How many additional watchmen have been employed, and at what salaries?

Does the custody of gold cost anything? Does it have to be deposited in vaults? Is any vigilance or place of deposit required for its safe-keeping? Is greater "structural security" demanded for silver than for gold coin and bullion?

We have a good crop of silver; our mines are rich with this precious metal; it is a vast domestic product and a needful commodity. That would be a poor argument for the provident husbandman who had been blessed with abundant crops as the reward of his toil and thrift to say that it would cost too much to construct cribs and barns in which to garner his harvests. Present or prospective redundancy of yield would not frighten or prevent him from making adequate provision for the custody and safety of the fruits of his labor. We erect spacious and commodious buildings, of great structural beauty, comfort, and security, for the accommodation of the various Departments of the Government and their manifold purposes; for the Army, the Navy, the Judiciary, the Interior, with all its ramified service, the Treasury and its numerous subdepartments, for executive and legislative uses, for postal convenience, for agriculture, for museums and institutes, for bureaus and commissions, for officiary and subofficiary, to say nothing of monuments and statuary. Immense outlays of public money are constantly made for furniture and appliances. It would be an interesting statement to Federal tax-payers if a full bill of particulars were exhibited.

It seems that ingenuity is taxed for the invention of plausible schemes for additions, ornaments, and conveniences connected with the public business of the country. Millions and millions of dollars have been expended and are being annually appropriated for these and kindred purposes. If the public interest requires such expenditures, no reasonable objection can or ought to be interposed. The Government ought to provide proper facilities for the conduct of its necessary business. But it is an extravagant and prodigal expenditure to construct a few simple vaults in which to store the treasure of the country! A wondrous spell of economy has seized upon public attention, and the dreadful spectacle is presented of the necessity to use a little stone or brick and mortar, iron and steel, locks and bars with which to make safe depositories for our silver money! The money of the Government not in circulation among the people ought to be in the custody of the Government. Let us not "strain at the gnat" in the vault while we "swallow the camel" in the stately edifice, or worry our souls any more about the safe-keeping of our silver than our gold. I have searched with some care and have failed to discover in any of the recent reports submitted to Congress just exactly how much it has cost the Government "for the construction of vaults" for the deposit of silver dollars, and being desirous of information upon this subject, I called upon Mr. Bell, the Supervising Architect in the Treasury Department, and from him have received the following:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
December 28, 1885.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of yesterday, I have the honor to inform you that no vaults were supplied by this Department prior to 1878 exclusively for the storage of silver dollars; since 1878, to the present time, vaults for the storage and safe-keeping of silver dollars have been supplied for the following Government buildings, at a cost for each herein specified:

Baltimore (Md.) custom-house, &c.:
Vault and fittings, including cost of freight, foundation, &c	$8,268 18
Chicago (Ill.) custom-house, &c.:
Vault and fittings, including cost of freight, foundations, &c	8,050 02
New Orleans (La.) custom-house, &c.:
Vault and fittings, including cost of freight, foundations, &c	20,980 67
New York subtreasury:
Vault and fittings, including cost of elevator, stairease, foundations, freight, &c	38,698 25
Philadelphia Mint:
Vault and fittings, including cost of foundations, freight, &c	6,985 52
Philadelphia custom-house:
Vault and fittings, including freight, foundations, elevator, &c	13,274 63
Philadelphia post-office and custom-house:
Lattice partitions for assistant treasurer, vaults that are temporarily used by superintendent of Mint for storage of coin	992 62
Saint Louis custom-house:
Vault, fittings, &c., about	7,900 00
San Francisco subtreasury:
Vault and fittings, including cost of freight, foundations, &c	10,287 25
Vaults and fittings, including cost of freight, foundations, &c	17,159 77
Vault and fittings, including foundations, &c	6,327 16
San Francisco mint:
Vault and fittings, including foundation, freight, &c	9,346 08
Vault and fittings, including freight, &c	7,588 79
Treasury building, Washington, D. C.:
Vault and fittings, including freight, foundations, &c	50,090 72

Respectfully yours,

M. E. BELL,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. S. W. T. LANHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

From this it will be observed that the aggregate "expense for the construction of vaults" and incidentals described is $205,949.66. During these eight years it has only cost the Government about one-half the amount per annum which we pay our Senators and Representatives for stationery, and the vaults remain, while the stationery is gone. We learn from the Director of the Mint that the seigniorage on the coinage of silver dollars during the last fiscal year was $4,355,278.84. Subtract the cost of constructing the vaults from the seigniorage earned by the Government in one year and it is difficult to perceive wherein the coinage of the silver dollar is a losing business, without taking into consideration the present value of the vaults.

Mr. Chairman, I am no apologist for extravagant or unnecessary outlays of public money. Economical administration, if it be a possibility under our present system of Federal taxation, is a supreme desideratum; but, according to my mode of thinking, the forces of economy could find countless objects of attack infinitely more "worthy of their steel" and formidable to popular interests than the cost of building vaults for the storage of silver treasure.

Mr. Chairman, I am a bimetallist. I believe that gold is as much constitutional money as silver and silver as gold, and I would not displace either from its rightful position as an equal standard of value. I believe that gold paid out will as inevitably find its way back to the Treasury as silver, less that amount which may be left in actual circulation. I do not believe in the very nature of things that gold can or will circulate among the people to the same extent as does silver, and I further believe that the unrestricted coinage of each would maintain the just equilibrium and rightful purpose of the two metals as money. The discrimination against silver is the cause of the appreciation in gold and the proximate cause of the hoarding of gold. If the coinage of silver were free, like gold, then the great and fundamental law of supply and demand would regulate and preserve the province of each and aid in the maintenance of the desired equivalence. In that event no question of constitutional warrant would arise, and no gold would be required for the purchase of silver bullion. If during the eighty-one years when the coinage of full legal-tender silver dollars was free our mints only coined $8,045,838, why should there now be such a dread that the free coinage of silver will engender a plethora in silver money? It is a matter of speculation as to what amount of silver dollars would be coined. It would depend on a variety of causes. I think it is by no means certain that in the end it would average more than the present annual coinage.

In the estimate of the silver coinages in eighteen countries of the world during the calendar year 1884, it is stated by the Director of the Mint that the amount was $90,000,000. Mexico coined $25,000,000, India $13,800,000, and Spain nearly $7,000,000. If our Government were to coin one-half of this amount per annum, we would not then exceed the maximum allowance under the act of 1878. If we were to coin more under such conditions than we now do, the country would not be endangered. The citizen would vie with the Government in effecting its circulation and stability in value.

Whatever the result might be as to the extent of coinage, such a method would commend itself for fairness, be less dependent for success on artificial than natural causes, and come to us sanctioned by the wisdom and precedent of the past. When gold is made to feel that it shall not be allowed, by legislative enactment or the pleasure and conduct of any Department, to usurp any of the inherent privileges or detract from the constitutional powers of its elder brother, silver, then it will be content to remain the equal associate of silver, and have no desire to part company with it. Gold is aggressive and seeks supremacy over silver, while the latter is simply struggling for the protection of its proper rights. If silver be substituted it will be the fault of gold, and in consequence of its wrongful encroachment on the domain of silver.

But suppose the business of the country should go to a silver basis? While the double standard is right and desirable and ought not be destroyed, still it is my deliberate conviction that if a single standard should be precipitated, which seems to be the purpose of gold advocates, it would be far better for the country and infinitely more equitable to the people that silver should be that standard. For eighty-one years it occupied its appropriate sphere in our standard of values. The Comptroller says:

> What effect this [silver basis] would have it is difficult to predict. It would appear, however, that gold would go to a premium, which would compel its being held to a certain extent as an article of merchandise, and it would not circulate as money. This would probably occasion contraction in credits and financial disturbance.

To contract credits and disturb bondholders would be a dreadful calamity, but how about expanding and magnifying debts, limiting the available monetary supply with which to liquidate them, and upon which the contract was made, and disturbing and oppressing the "vast army" of debtors throughout the land? Is it a small thing "to violate the equities as between debtor and creditor?"

As before intimated, we produce nearly half the silver in the world, and a considerable quantity of it is found in our gold mines. In the economy of nature these metals are united and blended in the earth, so that exploiting the one brings forth the other. There is a geminate relation between them in nature, governmental policy, and financial science, and they can and will fraternize as monetary agencies if left to their normal action and undisturbed by vicious legislation. Shall our silver mines lie dormant and our miners go unemployed in order to augment credits and gratify the greed for gold? Making some allowance for increase in population and one or two unimportant changes since the publication of the subjoined statement, taken from the report of the United States Silver Commission, it will be discovered that nearly three-fourths of the people of the world have an exclusive silver standard, and comparatively few an exclusive gold standard, while 187,300,000 employ the double standard, as follows:

SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

	Population.		Population.
Russia	76,000,000	Peru	3,400,000
Austria	36,000,000	China	400,000,000
Egypt	4,500,000	British India	237,144,456
Mexico	8,000,000
Central America	2,600,000	Total	768,944,456
Ecuador	1,300,000

DOUBLE-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

	Population.		Population.
Greece	1,400,000	France	36,000,000
Roumania	4,000,000	Belgium	5,000,000
Colombia	2,900,000	Switzerland	2,700,000
Venezuela	1,900,000	Italy	26,800,000
Chili	1,600,000	Spain	16,400,000
Uruguay	400,000	United States	50,000,000
Paraguay	1,200,000
Japan	33,000,000	Total	187,300,000
Holland	3,700,000

GOLD-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Great Britain	32,000,000	Norway	1,780,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope, and Australian Colonies	7,000,000	Sweden	4,300,000
Germany	42,000,000	Total	87,080,000

From this it would appear that a silver standard in this country would harmonize us with those nations which have an exclusive silver standard, and might facilitate the cultivation of our commercial relations therewith to our advantage and the furnishing of better markets for our manufactured products. There need be no fear, however, that the continued coinage of silver will drive gold out of this country or cause a separation of the two metals, if the experience of the past thirteen years be any criterion for the future. From 1873 to 1878 the exports of gold exceeded the imports by more than $123,000,000; from 1878 to the present the imports have exceeded the exports by more than $200,000,000. We have now $433,000,000 more of gold than we had when the silver-coinage act of 1878 was passed, and since that time our exports of silver have exceeded the imports by about $16,000,000 per annum. When silver was demonetized gold went abroad; since its partial rehabilitation gold has remained at home and invited additional importation.

If the bonded indebtedness of the United States be payable in coin; if silver is produced pari passu with the increase of population and demands of commerce; if there be less of gold and more of silver attainable; if the primacy in silver production be conceded to the United States, and it is useful for purposes of trade with the vast majority of the people of the globe; if it will pay off mortgages and deeds of trust, and settle any and all private debts; if a bondholder can not decline it, and a poor man is glad to get it, it seems to me that "it is difficult to predict" wherein it would more disastrously affect the country to have silver than gold as the basis. The trouble is that gold wants to be the basis, while silver only contends for its proper share in the standard of values. Let gold "part company" with silver, if it will, the farewell will be self-sought and voluntary; but may the day never come in "these ends of the earth" when silver, as a fiscal agency, shall be overthrown in our public and private transactions. Rather let it be—

The great avenging day
When Monopoly's columns in the dust shall lay;
When Mammon's power and Mammon's self shall fall,
And one prodigious ruin swallow all!

Mr. Chairman, early in January last there came into my possession the following remarkable document, which in this connection I ask to be reported in hæc verba, preserving the peculiar emphasis as contained in the original, and giving the names of the officers and directors:

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, December 24, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Thanking you for your letter of recent date, the Committee on Silver Coinage desire to know if you will co-operate with them in the way of distributing documents, and otherwise, for the purpose of influencing public sentiment in favor of the early suspension of the Bland law?

To that end it is earnestly requested—

First. That YOU write a personal letter AT ONCE to the Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C., URGING HIM TO REFRAIN FROM PLACING EXTREME SILVER MEN ON THE COINAGE COMMITTEE, and so give "fair field and no favor" to all interests. This is very important, and to be of any value must reach Washington before January 5; if TOO LATE FOR LETTER TO REACH, PLEASE TELEGRAPH.

Second. That you write separate personal letters to your own Representative in Congress and your U. S. Senators expressing your views to them in the same manner as you did in your letter to this committee; also asking them if they will favor the suspension of the Bland law.

Third. After writing the above letters, please inquire QUIETLY among your friends and neighbors to ascertain their views upon the question, and induce as many as possible to write Mr. CARLISLE and your M. C. and Senators, in like manner.

Fourth. Please make note of all persons who promise so to write, and send list of their names to undersigned, who will from time to time issue CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION on the situation. The committee asks in return, occasionally, such information or suggestions as YOU can give.

If you will co-operate in the manner indicated you will assist very materially in a work which promises success. PERSONAL LETTERS are suggested in preference to formal petitions, as experience has shown them to be most effective. Will you favor us with a reply?

Very truly yours,

THE COMMITTEE ON SILVER COINAGE,
A. B. MILLER, Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, with one exception, I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with the gentlemen whose names appear on this "confidential circular," nor any knowledge as to their respective vocations in life. I express the opinion that very few of them are in the ranks of the "vast army" of those who seek employment, and that none of them can be classed with the laboring men and wage-workers of the country. It is my belief that "they toil not, neither do they spin." I wish I had time to enlarge upon the contents of this circular, and the objects involved, but it speaks for itself and conveys its own instruction.

Mr. Chairman, I have yet to hear a laboring man or woman, a Knight of Labor, a member of a State grange or Farmers' Alliance, or a wage-worker of any kind demand the suspension of silver coinage. I know that many of my constituents representing these classes have protested against it in private conversation and by public remonstrance, and I should feel recreant to my convictions of personal rectitude and derelict in the discharge of representative duty if I failed, in their name and behalf, to voice an invincible repugnance and unyielding hostility to the purpose of obstructing or destroying the coinage of silver. I do not believe that the movement against silver is in the interest of the poor man, inspired in behalf of his wages, or organized as a breakwater against the cupidity and avarice of the "banks and rich speculators."

We have seen that the bankers and income-owners seek the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars. Do they meet and resolve and issue their proclamations against their own interests and in pure sympathy with the toilers of the country? If so, the mainsprings of human action have been changed, the current of human motive has been reversed, and men are not what they always have been. To say that the banker has espoused the cause of the poor and the bondholder is in tears for the laborer, that the rich man distresses himself about the poor man's wages, is to make Dives embrace Lazarus, to repudiate a long record of covetousness, and falsify the history of selfishness in the past. Save the solecism! The lion and the lamb have lain down together! The millennium is upon us!

I believe a more "severe contraction of the circulating medium" will ultimately result if silver coinage be suspended for any considerable period than if every dollar in gold which now actually circulates at all should quit the field of circulation, so far as the masses are concerned. The people use silver, while as before stated gold as money is practically unknown by them. I further believe that the hoarding of gold will decrease when the hoarders are made to understand that silver coinage is a permanency.

In reply to the argument that the silver dollar is only worth 80 cents, I have to say that the logic of facts proves that it will buy as much as any other dollar and pay debts to the extent of any other dollar. It is current at the teller's desk, at the merchant's counter, at the drug store, at the blacksmith shop—everywhere. No instance is remembered since 1878, in any part of the country, where ten dollars in silver, gold, Treasury notes, bank bills or coin certificates were not readily interchangeable, and the one held as good and treated as valuable as the other. It may not be without profit and instruction, however, to submit a brief review of the history of silver coinage in the United States since the foundation of the Government, from which it may be ascertained whether the cry of debased and dishonest dollar is well founded.

At the risk of being tedious, and for the information of those who may not have investigated the subject, I copy the following summary, which includes not only the standard silver dollar but the trade-dollar and subsidiary coins:

THE STANDARD SILVER DOLLAR.

Authorized to be coined, act of April 2, 1792. Weight, 416 grains; fineness, .892.4; value, $1. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced, 1794. Weight changed, act of January 18, 1837, to 412.5 grains. Fineness changed, act of January 18, 1837, to .900. Coinage discontinued, act of February 12, 1873. Total amount coined previous to act of February 12, 1873, $8,045,838. Coinage reauthorized, act of February 28, 1878. (New pattern.) Amount coined during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $28,528,552. Total amount coined to close of fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $211,930,219.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Authorized to be coined, act of February 12, 1873. Weight, 420 grains; fineness, .900; "not a legal tender." Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, 903. Coinage commenced, 1874. Coinage suspended by Secretary of the Treasury, February 22, 1878. Total amount coined to close of fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, $35,959,360. Proof pieces executed during the calendar year 1879, $1,541; in 1880, $1,987, and in 1881, $960.

THE SILVER HALF-DOLLAR.

Authorized to be coined, act of April 2, 1792. Weight, 208 grains; fineness, .892.4; value, 50 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced, 1794. Weight changed, act of January 18, 1837, to 206.25 grains. Fineness changed, act of January 18, 1837, to .900. Weight changed, act of February 21, 1853, to 192 grains. Weight changed, act of February 12, 1873, to 12.5 grams, or 192.9 grains. Amount coined during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $2,557.50. Total amount coined to close of fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $122,768,202.50.

THE SILVER QUARTER-DOLLAR.

Authorized to be coined, act of April 2, 1792. Weight, 104 grains; fineness, .892.4; value, 25 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced 1796. Weight changed, act of January 18, 1837, to 103.125 grains. Fineness changed, act of January 1837, to .900. Weight changed, act of February 21, 1853, to 96 grains. Weight changed, act of February 12, 1873, to 6.25 grams, or 96.4 grains. Amount coined during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $2,178.85. Total amount coined to close of fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $38,498,097.50.

THE SILVER TWENTY-CENT PIECE.

Authorized to be coined, act of March 3, 1875. Weight, 5 grams, or 77.1 grains; fineness, .900; value, 20 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced, 1875. Coinage discontinued, act of May 2, 1878. Total amount coined, $271,000.

THE SILVER DIME.

Authorized to be coined, act of April 2, 1792. Weight, 41.6 grains; fineness, .892.4; value 10 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced, 1796. Weight changed, act of January 18, 1837, to 41.25 grains. Fineness changed, act of January 18, 1837, to .900. Weight changed, act of February 21, 1853, to 38.4 grains. Weight changed, act of February 12, 1873, to 2.5 grams, or 38.58 grains. Amount coined during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $315,671.40. Total amount coined to close of fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, $18,608,843.90.

HALF-DIME.

Authorized to be coined, act of April 2, 1792. Weight, 20.8 grains; fineness, .892.4; value 5 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, 1.5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced, 1794. Weight changed, act of January 18, 1837, to 20.625 grains. Fineness changed, act of January 18, 1837, to .900. Weight changed, act of February 21, 1853, to 19.2 grains. Coinage discontinued, act of February 12, 1873. Total amount coined $4,906,946.90.

THE SILVER 3-CENT PIECE.

Authorized to be coined, act of March 3, 1851. Weight, 12.375 grains; fineness, .750; value, 3 cents. Deviation in weight allowed in coinage, .5 grains. Deviation in fineness allowed in assay, .003; lowest, .897; highest, .903. Coinage commenced 1851. Weight changed, act of March 3, 1853, to 11.52 grains. Fineness changed, act of March 3, 1853, to .900. Coinage discontinued, act of February 12, 1873. Total amount coined, $1,281,850.20.

We now have, saving a change of pattern, the identical silver dollar that was authorized by the act of January 18, 1837, the act of 1878 reauthorizing the coinage of the very same dollar. The weight and fineness are precisely the same. It contains exactly the same amount of pure silver. Leaving out the five years of demonetization, it has been in use for nearly a half century as the lawful dollar of the United States. It has only been of late years that any cry has been urged against it on account of a lack of intrinsic value, and that clamor has been aggravated for the purpose of appreciating gold. It is a fact that we put more silver in the dollar by 3 per cent. than any other nation except Mexico.

Any owner of gold bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into coin or bars for his benefit. (Revised Statutes, section 3519.)

When coined he can put it in circulation, invest it in property, or hoard it for the future. The only limitation put upon him is the quantity of bullion he may possess. The capacity of the mines, the success in discovery, the industry of the miner, the demand and supply have regulated the amount of gold coined in the United States. The law now restricts silver coinage, and whether through the unfriendliness of Treasury officials or the opposition of administrations the minimum allowance in the purchase and coinage of silver bullion has rarely, if ever, been exceeded. Silver is fought while gold is favored. Silver, I repeat, has not depreciated, but gold has appreciated in consequence of discriminating legislation. Silver has been abased, while gold has been exalted. I trust and believe that the time is surely coming when that which was made into "shekels, current money of the merchants" in the days of Abraham, shall be exalted to its rightful position in the metallic currency of this country.

What man in this broad land, bondholder or yeoman, has ever lost a cent or suffered any injury in consequence of the amount of silver in the standard dollar? The bondholder paid, upon the average, about 50 to 60 cents in coin for his bond. The law says he may be paid "in coin of the standard value" of July 14, 1870, the date of the refunding act, in these 80-cent dollars if you please. I want to know wherein he is victimized or defrauded if his bond is discharged in standard silver dollars. But suppose you add 20 cents more of silver to the dollar, what is the result? If you construe the contract strictly, when the bondholder presents his obligation, and is tendered in payment a silver dollar of different weight and value from that which obtained when his debt was funded under the act mentioned, may he not decline to receive it and demand payment in gold? If, however, then as now, the debt could be paid in silver, what effect would the additional 20 cents have on the "equities between the debtor and the creditor?" Where the creditor could claim four dollars before he would then demand five. Add one-fifth to public and private debts, and the result is startling. But even that, cruel as such a proposition is, will not satisfy the opponents of silver. Its coinage must be suspended. Money must be made scarcer. Gold must be made higher. The power of the banks and the possessors of gold must be still further increased. The springs of popular endurance, already bent, must be pressed to the last receding point. Gold must be made the only standard. Public obligations and private contracts payable in silver must be paid in gold. The country must be turned over to the dominion of plutocracy.

I say here and now to the enemies of silver, if you would avert the alleged calamity of a silver basis; if you would preserve a constitutional bimetallism in this country; if you would turn away disaster and discontent, let up in your persistent crusade against silver. If I have any proper conception of the real feeling and sentiment of the masses of the people on this subject that Representative who votes to suspend the coinage of silver and whose constituents are not largely composed of urban money-changers, will in my humble judgment—with due deference to the opinions of others—be relegated to the shades of private life; be he Democrat or Republican, if he represents a rural people—farmers, laborers, wage-workers—men of modest wealth or scant possessions, that vote will register his political doom, I care not how pure soever his motives may be, whom it may please, or at whose recommendation it be done. What was said by the Legislature of Ohio in 1877 is re-echoed all over the Union. The people have not changed their opinion. Let those, the rich and powerful, who would now in any measure repeat the deed of 1873, and impair the rank of silver as lawful money, remember the language of that resolution and the experience of the past and take warning; for while this great Republic will fully protect them in all their rights, under the letter and spirit of the contract, still it will not permit them to despoil the tax-payers of the country, add another grain to the weight of debt or another burden to the back of toil.

The latter clause of the banker's resolution before quoted says: "The law (silver coinage) should be immediately suspended and remain inoperative until an international agreement with leading commercial nations shall give substantial assurance as to the future relations of gold and silver as money."

The Comptroller of the Currency says (report, page 19):

> The discontinuance of the coinage of the silver dollar might perhaps have a tendency to bring about some agreement with other nations and the fixing of a standard for a series of years.

The Secretary of the Treasury concedes the improbability of any international agreement.

The President says:

> But it is perfectly apparent that a line of action in regard to our currency can not wisely be settled upon or persisted in without considering the attitude on the subject of other countries with whom we maintain intercourse through commerce, trade, and travel.

It may be well enough to give a brief explanation of the Latin Union about which so much has been said. It was first organized in 1865 between France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, all speaking languages derived from the Latin, whence its name. Greece was added in 1867; and to this day these five nations keep up a monetary league, regulating coinage under the same designation. This agreement stipulates a uniform gold and silver coinage (both of fineness and weight) for all, declares the silver coins legal tender between individuals to the amount of 50 francs, binds the nation issuing them to receive them to any amount, and limits the coinage of 5-franc pieces for a series of years to 120,000,000 francs per annum. This last limitation is now replaced by an agreement to suspend silver coinage for five years, but continuing the gold redemption of silver in each country.

The immediate cause of the Latin Union, it is said, were the gold discoveries of California and Australia. A reference to the map will show that Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy all have a western border on France, while Greece is a little peninsula southeast from France. Being contiguous countries the object of the Union was to facilitate the reciprocal use of their respective coins.

The act of 1878, under which the present silver dollar is coined, provided that "the President shall invite the governments of the countries, composing the Latin Union, so called, and of such other European nations as he may deem advisable, to join the United States in a conference to adopt a common ratio between gold and silver, for the purpose of establishing internationally the use of bimetallic money and securing fixity of relative values between these metals." These countries composing the Latin Union contain in the aggregate 365,705 square miles, of which France has 204,030; Belgium, 11,369; Switzerland, 15,908; Italy, 114,380, and Greece, 20,018. Their combined area is less that that of Texas and Colorado. The district I have the honor to represent is about one-third its size, and I can offset Belgium with Presidio County. The value of the imports and exports of merchandise into and from the United States from and to these countries during the year ending June 30, 1885, is as follows:

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.
France	$56,935,352	$44,562,334
Belgium	8,695,084	25,373,756
Switzerland	13,863,432	46,360
Italy	14,492,908	11,690,142
Greece	596,707	207,822
Total	94,583,483	81,880,414

The aggregate population of these countries, as taken from the latest census of each, is 76,203,463. Ere long and ours will be as great. The area, the population, the extent and importance of our commercial relations and travel with the countries composing the Latin Union do not seem to me to be of such magnitude as to render it absolutely necessary that we should, if permitted to do so, be compelled to join this "monetary league" in order to preserve our financial existence and maintain our national prosperity. If we accept the advice of the bankers and suspend the law until we obtain the international agreement mentioned we will, in my judgment, suspend for all time to come. It seems that repeated efforts have been made to compass this agreement with the Latin Union and other European nations, all of which have resulted in signal failure. It seems that the New York "delegate, well instructed in fiscal science," sent out by the present administration, has met with no better success than his predecessors. "The steps thus taken have more fully demonstrated the uselessness of further attempts" in this direction.

In view of the persistent rejection of all our overtures by foreign governments for the last eight years, it is a mild prediction of the barest possibility when the Comptroller tells us that—

> The discontinuance of the coinage of the silver dollar by our Government might perhaps have a tendency to bring about some agreement with other nations.

Mr. Chairman, I believe with Mr. Pierrepont that—

> It is time that we had a financial system of our own, suited to our conditions, as every other great nation has, and it is high time that we cease begging the old monarchies of Europe to tell us in what ratio to gold we may coin our silver.

I am one of those who believe that our country is large enough, independent enough, and grand enough to act upon its own motion in the establishment of a financial policy without prostrating itself in the dust of humility before foreign nations and supplicating their gracious permission and co-operation in our monetary plans and purposes. We have attained our national majority and can dispense with a guardian. There is other commerce in the world besides that supplied by the countries composing the Latin Union. We are as independent of Great Britain and Germany as they are of us. We have a domestic as well as foreign use for money. Our geographical position and population certainly ought to justify us in coining as much silver as the French have, and we must coin $300,000,000 more before reaching that point.

It is gratifying to learn that the German people are clamorous for the overthrow of gold monopoly. They have observed the glaring iniquities as between debtor and creditor which are consequent upon a single gold standard. Their farmers and peasantry have in no doubtful language declared their grievances to the chancellor and the Reichstag; they say that the gold standard is grossly unjust to debtors, making money dear and threatening ruin to their agricultural interests, and from the late reports it seems that their voice is being heard even by that imperial government. An intrepid course on the part of the United States will excite the admiration of other countries, and inspire their courage in the vindication of popular rights. Why should we not take the lead and stand in the forefront of the battle for bimetallism? Why should we temporize, copy from or beg affiliation with foreign nationalities? We are as self-supporting as any other government beneath the sun. The trade of the Asian countries, South America, and Mexico invites our attention, and the ports of every clime are open to our commerce.

Mr. Chairman, I favor the continued coinage of the standard silver dollar and would remove therefrom every hindrance and restriction. I would render the mints of the Government accessible to every bullion-owner. If foreign bullion come in, let it be coined into American dollars for the purchase of American merchandise, for American monetary use, and the stimulation of American industries. With the limitation proposed under the bill of the minority I would allow silver to be coined in whatever quantities presented with a privilege and facility equal to gold. I would not add to the present weight and fineness of the silver dollar for the reasons already assigned, and further because it is not desirable or expedient to increase the inducements which would render it an exportable commodity or cause it to be hoarded in consequence of augmented commercial value. I would not reduce it or disturb the present ratio because of the law of the contract. The public debt should be paid before it is made to differ from the then standard value contemplated in the refunding act before mentioned. I would remove the shackles from and enlarge the scope of its usefulness by free and unlimited coinage. This, in my judgment, will suitably adjust the relations between gold and silver coin, and as much as any other measure check and control the variations in the standards of value.

There is just as much necessity for reducing the weight and fineness of gold coin as there is for increasing that of silver. Natural causes will preserve the harmonies between them in the ratio which now subsists when the embargo on silver is raised and give to our metallic currency that stability and value which was designed by the framers of our Government. If perchance some adventurous silver miner, who has braved the exposures and perils which attend the videttes of civilization and paved the way by his labor and courage for a grander development of our glorious country, shall receive some compensation for his efforts and discoveries and find a market for his bullion the people will soon recover from any imaginary shock in consequence of any supposed legislative partiality to his pursuits and grudge him not his well-earned rewards, but find relief in his ultimate contributions to the public weal.

Mr. Chairman, we have a great work before us. May we prove equal to all its necessities. Let us reduce our tariffs, build up our merchant marine, remove the obstacles which retard our commerce with the nations of the earth, coin our silver as we do our gold, and adopt our own national policies. Then "prosperity will not hesitate upon our threshold nor capital shrink from trade," nor opportunity be lacking for the unemployed; but the interdependence and interrelations of labor and capital will be promoted, the kinship of wealth and work conserved, the estrangement between gold and silver averted, and reunited in one happy fraternity all the elements of our national strength will combine to solidify and perpetuate the grandeur and glory of this mighty Republic. Then the rich will not oppress the poor, and the poor will not despise the rich, but peace, contentment, and good-will to men will reassert their rightful dominion in the hearts of the people. [Great applause.]

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, that the coinage question is one of grave importance to the American people is evidenced by the fact that in the House and at the other end of this Capitol Senators and Representatives have deemed it worthy of diligent study and elaborate discussion.

If there are any statistics furnished by this or any other country bearing upon the question which have not been produced and commented upon I have not found them. And if many of the figures produced have even a remote bearing upon the real issue involved in the various propositions affecting our coinage—and sought to be enacted into law—I have also been unable to discover wherein they afford us any help in arriving at a correct judgment as to what is our duty in the premises.

Whether what I propose to say will throw any additional light upon the question it is not for me to say. It is sufficient for my purpose that I am permitted in my own way to give some of the reasons which will control my vote when we come to any definite propositions offered for our decision.

I do not think it will aid us in any way to call each other hard names, nor do I think we shall add strength to our convictions by calling in question the honesty of those who differ with us.

If I may be able to fairly understand and correctly represent the deliberate judgment of the constituency for whom I speak I shall have accomplished what I conceive to be the highest duty of a Representative in this House.

I know of no better safeguard to the rights of the people than a knowledge that it is to them that we must account for our actions here.

The questions before Congress and the American people are:

Shall we adopt gold as the sole monetary standard in this country?

Shall we continue the double standard of gold and silver with free private coinage of silver added?

Shall we continue to coin silver under the Bland act, or shall we suspend for the time being the coinage of silver dollars?

Each of these propositions have their advocates in the House, but after all the real question is, shall we adopt the single gold standard or shall we maintain the double standard of gold and silver as the future monetary system of the United States?

Settle in our minds which side of this proposition we stand upon, and we can find some common ground of agreement among those who stand with us as to the details of legislation by which we expect to effectuate our purpose.

For, I take it, those who advocate either temporary or permanent suspension of silver coinage desire eventually to drive silver out of our monetary system except for subsidiary coin, and bring us to a gold standard, pure and simple; and that those who are opposed to suspension, whether they are in favor of free coinage or not, desire to maintain the double standard.

As I view it, this is the sharp issue presented, and one which we must settle in our own minds before coming to the settlement of details of legislation.

I take it for granted also that those who believe in gold alone for this country believe in gold alone for the whole world, and would, if they had the power, blot silver out of existence as money, other than as token coin; and that those who believe in the double standard in this country believe in it for the world's standard, and would, if in their power, make silver and gold the money metals of all nations, and will, so far as in their power, legislate toward that end.

There may be a small number who do not believe in coin money, but who advocate silver with hot earnestness when it grows cheap, and who grow lukewarm and indifferent as it appreciates toward gold in value.

I shall not turn aside from a consideration of the main question to examine the views of such, because they have no place in this discussion.

In looking at the history of this money question it seems to me there is a wisdom not born of conscious reason which in every period of the world's history seems to have guided nations and men to certain necessary conditions of national and individual prosperity and progress. Since history began to be written silver and gold have performed their office of measuring value with reasonable certainty and stability. Everywhere and always, except in these later days, they have held their places as "precious metals" fit to be coined into money as standard measures of the value of one's labor or possessions.

The world's wealth and business have adjusted themselves to the amount of these metals available for coinage.

Their relative amounts and uses have determined the ratio of value between them, and nations have recorded the adjustment in their coinage laws.

Property has been acquired, obligations have been assumed, debts created, credits given, under the sanction and sanctity of laws made with reference to them and in reliance as well upon experience as to the probable amounts and uses of these metals at any given period.

If it is true, as I have assumed, that property values have adjusted themselves to the world's coin supply, it does not take a financier to understand that great disturbance and disarrangement of values must necessarily follow any considerable diminution of the world's coinage. To this view of the question I call especial attention, for I conceive that around it hinges every argument upon either side.

I have said I look upon every attempt to demonetize silver as aimed at its ultimate elimination from the world's money, leaving gold as the only coin money and the only basis for paper currency and for exchanges through the banks.

Taking all the statistics in regard to the world's coin, and it is safe to say there are about $7,000,000,000 now in existence of silver and gold in coin used as money, and that the amount is about equally divided between the two metals, with a possible slight preponderance in favor of gold.

I think it will be admitted that the amount of paper currency which may be safely issued in any nation is always determined by the amount of coin which exists in the nation and which may readily be obtained when required.

I shall also take it for granted that the amount of business which may safely be done through the banks in the way of checks and exchange also bears a direct relation to the amount of available money. Now, if we blot out of existence one-half of the coin of the world it follows that we destroy one-half of the power of coin in the business of the world, one-half of the money available as a support for paper currency or bank exchange. In other words, the business of the world must be done with one-half of the monetary agencies which are now available.

Assuming as I have that all property values are determined by the means available for carrying on the world's business, it follows that a shrinkage of value to the extent that we take away these available means must follow, and that, in the event assumed, we must recast all property values and count the world's permanent property at one-half of its present nominal value.

If you tell me that it is not intended to do this thing all at once, that the process is to be gradual, that silver in the present coined amounts is to be left to circulate so long as it will perform the functions of money, I answer that the same result will follow, except the process of halving values will be a little slower.

When all the great commercial nations declare it to be their policy to coin no more silver, from that moment the circumstance which has given to silver its chiefest value has been removed, and the value of silver bullion must rapidly decline to such an extent that it will force the present coinage out of circulation into the melting-pots. To avoid greater evils the nations will have to provide for the retirement of its whole silver coinage, except as subsidiary coin not available for the payment of debts or for the transaction of general business. So that look at the question from whatever point you will, every move toward a suspension of silver coinage in the commercial nations is a step toward the elimination of silver from the world's money and the consequent readjustment of all values. When this is accomplished it does not take a prophet to inform us that general bankruptcy will follow, whether it is accomplished immediately or is brought about by slow degrees.

Bankruptcy for everybody but the money-lenders and credit-owners, into whose hands the accumulations of generations now distributed among a great number will speedily be gathered. I grant you, if there were no debts; if every man owned the property in his possession, unencumbered; if no contracts existed extending beyond the hour, it would not make so great a difference with us about the nominal value placed upon our possessions.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has just referred to the "capitalists" whose property is represented by credits. I would like to ask him whether if the state of things to which he has just referred were brought about, the "capitalists," who after all must depend upon the permanent prosperity of the masses for their prosperity, would not suffer their share of the calamities which would fall upon the multitude of the people?

Mr. ROWELL. That depends upon how you look at the case. If by means of a depreciation in the value of all property the credit-owners are enabled to gather in the great body of the accumulated property so as to build up large estates for themselves, we shall simply have the condition of a great peasant population, with a few nabob money-owners. In my judgment they would be worse off than they are to-day. It depends upon how a person likes to live—whether he likes to live in great wealth in the midst of poverty, or likes to live in a community where benefits are universally distributed among the people.

Mr. CANNON. The answer of the gentleman is apt; and I substantially agree with him. The object of my question, however, was to direct the gentleman's mind to this point: That those who favor the use of but one metal to the exclusion of the other would in fact bring about a condition of affairs which in the end, from an economic standpoint, would destroy not only the masses of the people but themselves as well. So that those who favor the two metals are not only protecting themselves, but in fact protecting the monometallists from the consequences of their own proposed action.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. In other words, they are the best friends of the monometallists.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly, the best friends of the monometallists.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. So I claim.

Mr. ROWELL. But that is not the condition of things and never can be. Business can not be done in any such way. Every contract projects itself into the future, and the more stable the nominal value of things, on that account, the better it is for all concerned.

We can not separate ourselves from our surroundings, and we must consider the conditions which actually exist if we would correctly ascertain what is best to be done.

In discussing this question the so-called financiers are apt to assume that the only property to be thought about is such property as is produced for daily consumption, ignoring all the permanent wealth.

In the same way they consider debts and credits as being confined exclusively to the short-time transactions of the banks, forgetting that the great body of indebtedness is the long-time debt, represented by bonds and mortgages.

When they assume that the property of the world is consumed each year and that the debts are readjusted every ninety days, and so conclude that it is a small matter to rearrange values, they reason from a false basis and ignore the great facts which ought to control.

I have thus far assumed that the monetary affairs of all commercial nations having business relations with each other are matters of mutual concern and that this question of money is of mutual interest. It follows that the action of any one of these nations must to some extent be influenced by the action of other nations; but, inasmuch as we have only power to legislate for the United States, we are to consider what ought under all the circumstances to be our policy, that policy, I grant you, more or less modified by what other nations are doing and by the influence our acts may have upon the policy elsewhere.

I come to the main questions: Why ought we to eradicate silver from our monetary system? Are we under any legal or moral obligation to the owners of credits to do so? Does the safe and successful prosecution of business in the future demand it?

The answer of either of these questions in the affirmative will conclude the whole question in favor of the monometallists.

The answer of both in the negative, it seems to me, is conclusive of the opposite view.

Now, I assert that there is neither a legal nor moral obligation on the part of the Government toward credits to demonetize silver.

When I agree to pay a certain sum of money at a future time what legal obligation do I assume? Simply, that I will pay in the national coin or its equivalent so many dollars.

The nation on its part assumes this moral obligation toward me: that it will not increase my burden by adding to the amount of silver or gold in its legal coin, as the same existed by law at the time I assumed the obligation, without at the same time making provision to save me against loss by the increase. It assumes a like obligation towards my creditor, that it will not diminish the amount of silver or gold in its coinage so as to compel the creditor to receive less than he contracted for. But as between debtor and creditor there is no express or implied obligation that the bullion value of these metals shall continue the same actually or relatively in the bullion markets of the world.

Both parties take the risk of fluctuation in the very nature of things as they do when dealing in property. I grant you they do not expect such serious fluctuations in those metals as will affect their interchangeable use when coined into money, but the ground of their expectation of permanence in value is not the statute which regulates their coinage nor the duty which the Government owes to them. On the contrary, it is a knowledge of the history of the two metals as money, of the probable product of the mines, of the uses for which money will be required, a knowledge of those natural laws which regulate prices. Upon these they rely with that kind of faith which always enters into every transaction wherein the relation of debtor and creditor is established. As between them I know of no principle of law or morals which requires the nation to protect the creditor against a fall in the value of its coined money or the debtor against a rise in value, except in so far as they are a part of the general public and entitled to the benefit of such wise laws as may be required for the general good.

I recognize the duty of the Government toward all the people to enact such laws as seem best calculated to enhance the general prosperity, to make labor productive, to secure to industry and enterprise liberal returns, and so far as may be to render all kinds of legitimate business secure and stable when intelligently conducted.

And, therefore, I am obliged to concede the right and duty of the nation to exercise such control over its coinage as is required in the changing exigencies of nations, to secure commercial and business prosperity, which includes a reasonable degree of stability in the value of its coin, and this without reference to the demands of debtors or creditors as such, and even at the expense of the one or the other.

No one will deny that silver demonetized will enhance the value of all existing credits now payable in lawful money—and so increase the burden resting upon all debtors, while diminishing the normal value of their property and labor, and as a consequence their ability to meet their obligations.

If, therefore, the question resolves itself into one between debtor and creditor alone there can be but one answer—let the law remain as it is, for that is legal justice and business honesty. If class laws are to be made let them be made in the interest of the weaker—in the direction of equalizing the blessings of life.

The strong can take care of themselves.

Let us encourage enterprise—new industries, the building of better homes, more remunerative labor—rather than lend aid to those who would escape the risks attendant upon business venture to enjoy the certain profit and the indolent life of coupon clipping.

It has been claimed during this discussion that all our debts are, under the spirit of the law, payable in gold, though it is confessed that such is not and has not been the letter of the law, except during about four years of our history.

It is this spirit of the law which is urged as a matter of right and justice to the creditor.

It is insisted that up to 1873—although silver was a legal coin, with the mints open to all comers—yet as a matter of fact silver was not coined in any considerable quantities, and that credits were consequently given with reference to existing facts, to wit, that there was no silver with which to pay. In other words, knowing that the ratio of 16 to 1 in this country and 15½ to 1 in Germany and France and other countries made it more profitable to export silver than to coin it while there was a foreign demand, they had a right to rely upon the continuance of that foreign demand, the maintenance of such a value for silver bullion in foreign markets as would make it more profitable to ship than to coin.

Because that expectation has not been realized they now insist that an expectation ought to have the force of positive law.

So preposterous a claim ought not to be set up by those who assume to teach the House how little we know about this question of money, and who assume that the "average Congressman" mistakes his calling when he presumes to discuss it.

It is perfectly clear to them that we ought to follow the lead of other countries in respect to demonetization. It ought to be equally clear to them that contracts were not gold contracts in this country simply because it was more profitable to coin silver for Europe than for American use.

I conclude, therefore, that we may assume it as beyond dispute that all debts not specially made payable in gold can in law and morals be discharged by the payment of silver, and that good faith to the creditor does not demand the destruction of that coin. I have no antipathy to banks or money-lenders as a class. They are undoubtedly just as honest and just as patriotic as the average run of citizens, no more so, no less so. But I do not conceive that they are the only or the best financiers from a national standpoint. I speak of them here because it is frequently assumed that they, above all men, ought to be heeded upon the question under discussion. Thus the banks have assumed to be our instructors; from them comes all the agitation in favor of demonetization, and for them it is claimed that their superior knowledge ought to decide the question according to their views.

Oh, they can take care of themselves, say their spokesmen. They are not looking to their own selfish interests, but they are looking out for the property-owners, the wage-workers, and the debtors. So strong are their sympathies with the wage-workers that they want to protect them from being paid in depreciated money. How their sympathy goes out to the struggling poor! If they could only persuade the benighted people to turn over to them the care of their interests we are assured that prosperity will follow.

But somehow or other they do not succeed very well in the attempt. Whenever the voice of labor is heard, whenever the voice of the debtor is heard, whenever the industrial masses speak, we are reminded that we must not suspend the coinage of silver. The sheep are safer in the care of the faithful watch-dog than in that of the smooth-spoken wolf.

It is not true that these financiers are disinterested investigators. They are deeply interested, and that on the side they have espoused. To double the value of their possessions, to increase the purchasing power of money, to raise the rate of interest through scarcity are the golden visions which cloud their judgment. The very nature of their business has narrowed the scope of their investigations.

How to make large dividends rather than how to distribute the blessings and burdens of life is the financial problem which they study and seek to solve.

As for me, I decline to learn from such interested teachers, and shall look beyond and I think above them for wisdom to guide me in casting my vote?

What are the ostensible reasons for a suspension of coinage? Simply, that silver bullion in the ratio of 16 to 1 is not worth as much as gold. That being the cheaper metal it will drive gold out of circulation and in the end make us a silver monometallist nation, place us in the category of semi-civilized nations, force us to the rear in the race for commercial supremacy, and leave the great powers of Europe in possession of all the great business enterprises which enrich the world and conduce to public good. A different reason must have induced demonetization in 1873–'74, for then silver was as valuable as gold. It had been so much more valuable that it did not go into American coin, and the product of our mines had gone abroad to increase the money supply of the Old World.

Indeed, the commercial policy of the country previous to 1861 had for the most part been such as to drive the great body of our coin, gold and silver, out of the country, and leave us without any secure monetary basis, so that it only needed the approach of calamity to disorganize our whole monetary system. Had we so ordered our commercial affairs as to retain at home the $10,000,000,000 of gold produced in California, we would have had no occasion to put into circulation a currency whose circulating value depended upon confidence, rising and falling as the tide of battle was favorable or unfavorable. We must look beyond a difference in value for the action of 1873 and 1874.

I know it is said that the action of Germany in adopting a gold basis would throw some $400,000,000 in silver upon the market; that with free coinage in this country it would be profitable for her people to pay balances in silver and exchange silver for our gold, and that it became necessary to close our mints to silver to prevent the calamity of furnishing a dumping ground for all the silver of Europe.

It is quite possible that some danger threatened from that quarter, and being a protectionist I concede the probable necessity of legislation at that time to keep us in the line of bimetallist nations; but I do not concede the necessity of destroying our own wealth to keep other people from exchanging with us.

Before Europe would have made us the dumping ground for her silver her coinage must have fallen below par in ordinary circulation, something which has not happened yet. In the absence of such a contingency silver coin could not have been profitably shipped to this country for coinage in our mints in the ratio of 16 to 1. Subsequent events have demonstrated the shadowy character of the danger, if any was apprehended.

But I do not believe that such a supposed danger was the real inducement to demonetize.

The cause is to be found in the ever-existing contest of self-interest between the money and credit owners and the property owners, wage-workers, and debtors.

The law was enacted in the interest of contraction, of higher priced money, enhanced value of credits, diminished value of property, lower wages, more burdensome debts.

It was based upon the assumption that we had too large a circulating medium, causing our paper currency to circulate much below par with gold. That was the banker's theory; whereas the true reason was to be found in the fact that we had too little coin, and consequently too little confidence. The great West knows to its sorrow that from 1873 to 1878 there was a scarcity of money instead of redundancy. It was only when a wise statesmanship, not learned from the money kings, turned the nation into the channel of gathering coin from all sources, in preparation for specie resumption, that we gradually but surely came back to stable money and returning prosperity.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman has spoken of the importance of a large coinage of gold and silver. I would like to ask him whether it would not be a misfortune to the country if the $550,000,000 of gold now in circulation should be driven from circulation.

Mr. ROWELL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman also, whether he does not believe that an inferior currency will drive out of circulation a superior currency.

Mr. ROWELL. I was approaching that branch of the question; and if the gentleman will wait I will come to it directly. I think in what I am about to say I shall meet the very points which the gentleman seeks to raise.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question. He said a moment ago that the bankers, those interested in the banking business, seemed to be desirous to take care of the welfare of the country and its people, the wages of the workingmen, and all that. Now, does not the gentleman believe that the bankers of the country are really desirous of maintaining their business on business principles and of carrying it on in such a way as to make it safe, secure, and reliable?

Mr. ROWELL. My judgment is that the bankers, like the rest of us, have a good deal of selfishness in their composition. The managers of the banks study the question of large dividends, and they are very apt to consider a question of this kind as it acts upon themselves, not as it acts upon the great body of the people. I do not think that the president and directors of a bank, in making up a policy, stop to consider whether all over the country the people are going to have distributed wealth or whether wealth will be gathered into a few hands.

Mr. BAYNE. One question more, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. As to the distribution of wealth, I think myself that wealth is accumulated by labor without reference to the banks. But is it not true that every gold monometallic nation in the world to-day is letting out money at a far lower rate of interest than silver monometallic nations or bimetallic nations?

Mr. ROWELL. There the gentleman would lead me off into another line of argument which I can not go into just now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And it is an argument against the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Did not the gentleman from Illinois himself say but a few moments ago that if we perpetuate the two metals, gold and silver, and have a bimetallic currency in the country, it will bring the rate of interest down so as to make money accessible to borrowers?

Mr. ROWELL. I said, in substance, that.

Mr. BAYNE. Is it not true, let me ask the gentleman from Illinois, that every gold monometallic country in the world is putting out money at a low rate of interest while every silver monometallic country and every bimetallic country in the world are putting out money at a higher rate of interest?

Mr. ROWELL. When I taught school I used to demonstrate to the scholars that 1 was equal to 2, and then asked them to disprove it. And it took a good scholar to disprove it. Figures can be so used as to tell falsehoods or to convey false ideas. An old country, with the accumulations of a thousand years and with few facilities for investment, is obliged to put out money at a cheaper rate of interest necessarily than new countries with only a few years of accumulation; but to attempt to prove that any monometallic country can loan cheaper, with other conditions, than bimetallic countries is in my judgment trying to prove that 1 is equal to 2. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. Is it not true that the rate of interest is higher in new countries than in the older countries of the world, and does not that very fact meet the proposition which has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ROWELL. That is an illustration how figures may be distorted. Now, the plains of Asia were settled earliest, and there the population increased to such an extent that it overflowed into Europe, and yet I recollect since then that somehow or other civilization has departed from the plains of Asia, and we have got into the habit of regarding those Asiatic populations as only semi-civilized. We do not go there to find monetary examples and business principles for our imitation.

Mr. BAYNE. If civilization had not departed from Asia, if it had kept pace there with the rest of the civilized nations of the world, Asia to-day, in my judgment, instead of being a silver monometallic country, would, on the contrary, be a gold monometallic country.

Mr. ROWELL. My friend from Pennsylvania no doubt is the son of a prophet. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Our gold friends seem to deal in prophecies altogether. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, but so far their prophecies have seldom been fulfilled.

Mr. MILLARD. Is it not the effect of the gentleman's argument to prove 60 cents is equal to 100 cents in a silver dollar?

Mr. ROWELL. No; that is not my argument at all.

Mr. BAYNE. Is not that your effort?

Mr. ROWELL. My effort is to prove the very reverse. And now, having been diverted from the line of my observations, I ask to be permitted to proceed. And just here I beg leave to depart for a few moments from the course of my remarks up to this point in order to take issue with the statement that the demonetization of silver in 1873 brought about the commercial panic and calamity of that year. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it is always best to be honest and not to take it for granted that a cause is found because something happens to follow directly after something else. Financial crises and bankruptcies do not come without preparation.

Now, sir, the demonetization of silver in 1873 did not take a dollar out of circulation of this country at that time.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It was a mere coincidence.

Mr. ROWELL. No, it was not a coincidence. We had gone through four years of war. We had destroyed in this country $10,000,000,000 of accumulated wealth. We had a currency which did not circulate at par. So long as we kept on the top of the crust, so long as we did not know what were the difficulties, embarrassments, and troubles which were concealed from our view, business men everywhere did business on a falling basis, but when we found our losses were as large as they were, and when we found we were doing business on a falling market, because of the sinking value of money, it necessarily brought financial ruin on the country.

Mr. BAYNE. That is all true.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do not misunderstand me in the remark I made a little while ago. I said the demonetization of silver was a mere coincidence. I meant that it did not precipitate the panic of 1873.

Mr. ROWELL. We agree, then, on that proposition.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not indorse all the gentleman's remarks, but I agree with him that the demonetization of silver was not the cause of the panic in that year.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Because there was then no silver to be demonetized.

Mr. ROWELL. But I hold that the demonetization of silver, after we opened up our silver mines and began to be the great silver-producing country of the world, delayed us somewhat in getting back to prosperity.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes; it prevented us from getting back as soon as we otherwise would.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask if demonetization in this country and Europe together, which took place about the same time, did not have its influence in this respect?

Mr. CUTCHEON. But we could not control Europe.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Ah, that is true; but what another country does may affect us in this country, or any other which has commercial relations with it. But the question I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois is this: If demonetizing silver here and in Europe, thereby shutting off the money supply, did not have some effect upon the money volume here?

Mr. ROWELL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The bad affect of the act demonetizing silver, so far as it related to the panic of 1873, is this: It interposed an obstacle to prevent the return to prosperity which might have been reached sooner under other conditions.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes; but we might have had the calamity any way.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes; the calamity must have come under the conditions then prevailing.

Mr. ROWELL. Let me return to the line of argument I was following. If there were no debts it would not be so (that is an almost impossible condition in a civilized nation), but so long as a third of a nation's wealth is represented by its credits and outstanding contracts just so long will it be to the interest of the creditor to make money scarce, to limit its amount and so increase its power. But I take it the interest of the general public is best served when money is sufficiently plenty to prevent the money-owners from becoming monopolists, dictating terms to the borrower.

Nature has made the limit in the precious metals—the safe limit for both parties.

I confess to a little surprise at the criticism of our present limited coinage from those who did not want the change of 1873 because silver was dishonest money, but to keep out the silver of Germany. If that was what they wanted then, why should they say now it is inconsistent to coin the production of our own mines while we prevent Germany from trading her silver for our gold?

I think I see another reason for the criticism. Gold persistently refuses to leave the country or go out of circulation. More than $180,000,000 in our favor is the balance sheet between us and other countries since the Bland act went into effect, while the net exportation of silver is some $60,000,000.

Gold flows in, silver flows out.

Since we got down to a specie basis our gold coin has increased by the amount produced by our mines over what has been consumed in the arts and by the amount of our importations. Our silver coin has increased by the whole coinage under the Bland act, and our power to safely float paper currency has increased in a like ratio.

Interest has fallen and property increased in value by reason of this increased coinage, and, notwithstanding the diminished value of silver bullion, the silver dollar has maintained its place at par with gold.

We are constantly told that this state of things can not last; that money-owners will send their money abroad for investment to avoid the danger of a 20 per cent. loss; that they will require gold payments in future contracts and do a great many other terrible things if we do not heed their demands.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, I would ask my friend from Illinois if the situation were such that the money-lenders were making contracts payable in the future in gold coin, would he not deprecate that as I do, as a great danger?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, I would. I speak of it here, if the gentleman will observe.

Mr. BAYNE. Now the fact is that contracts, and a great many of them are being made this very day, money loaned on mortgages, and other commercial contracts, the stipulation of such contracts is that they shall be paid in gold.

Mr. ROWELL. I have had some personal experience in this regard. I recollect shortly after the close of the war that many money-lenders made five and ten year loans payable in gold, and I recollect that when these contracts became due and they wanted to renew them they could not, but had to go round and beg of the borrower that he would continue his loan by making an ordinary money contract.

I know it to be true in that section of the country which I represent that there are half a dozen willing to lend a thousand dollars where there is one man who wants to borrow a thousand dollars if the security is satisfactory; and if you make money plentiful there is not such danger of making hard contracts as when money is scarce. From 1873 to 1878, when every second farm all over the western world was under a heavy mortgage, when the mortgages became due the debtors could not get the money to release them, nor could they renew the mortgages and had to put the land upon the market. This condition of affairs cut down the value of every farm in my section of the country one-half; a fifty-dollar farm was worth $25; but just as soon as we changed the monetary conditions, as soon as we reached hard-pan, just as soon as a dollar was worth a dollar, the money in the coffers of the money-holders commenced to flow out and the twenty-five dollar farm went back to $50 again. There are more purchasers, as long as money is plentiful, than sellers, and better prices can be obtained. You can not now get any man in the country to make a gold contract.

Mr. BAYNE. All of which justifies and confirms the suggestion I have made, that when money got to par, when the conditions made every dollar of equal value with every other dollar, then the confidence was restored, property appreciated to its proper value, money became plenty, and there was a satisfactory market. But now the tendency is to introduce a debased currency upon the country, and the natural tendency will be to degrade values and reduce them and bring about the very state of things you refer to.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow a question just here?

Mr. ROWELL. I regret that I can not yield any more time, as I have but little of my hour remaining.

Now I confess their threats do not frighten me very much. Men who have money do not like to let it lie idle and pay taxes on it at the same time. It is not profitable. Men do not usually send money out of a progressive country, with wide fields for possible profits, into old countries where there is more money already than can find safe and profitable use. And then this threat of requiring future promises to pay to be made in gold has less terrors than it would have if the money-owners could succeed in shutting off our coin supply.

With our present supply, increasing as population and business increase, there are more lenders than borrowers, and the power to dictate has passed away. It takes two to make a bargain, and those who have occasion to use borrowed capital occupy the vantage ground. The lender can accept their terms or let his money lie idle.

But we are told that a silver dollar is only worth 79 cents; that while it now circulates at par with gold we are approaching the time when gold will command a premium. It is more than hinted that when that time comes silver will only circulate at its bullion value; that all the money and currency then in use will be reduced to the bullion value of silver and subject to its fluctuation; that property will then rise in nominal value, the cost of living be increased, and the real pay of the laborer be decreased; that in addition to cheating the creditor out of 20 per cent. of his just dues all who employ labor will be able to oppress their employés.

If these evils should come I am free to confess it would be a great calamity; but I suspect "the Greeks bearing gifts," the money-kings looking out for the laborers and seeking to secure them as allies.

Right here I desire to introduce a table showing the gold and silver coinage of the world, except some of the Asiatic silver nations. I do not wish to take up time in reading it, but use it as illustrating my argument. It is the table furnished by the Director of the Mint, so often used during this debate:

*Estimated by the Director of the Mint. †Wahrung's Politik, 1884. ‡Bank reserves only.

As illustrating how silver and gold circulate together without parting company in countries having a larger amount of silver in proportion to gold than we have, countries, too, which have ceased to coin silver, it is a very instructive table.

In the United States only a little over 31 per cent. of our coinage is silver. In Germany, a gold country, 38 per cent. and more of the coinage is silver, circulating at par with gold. In France over 41 per cent. of the coinage is silver. It is also true that the major part of the reserve in the Bank of France is silver. In Belgium over 48 per cent. of the coin is silver.

These countries are in Europe, near neighbors of England, with her gold standard, having intimate commercial relations with all Europe, and are still able to keep coined silver at par with coined gold. To my mind the simple statement of these facts is a complete answer to those who would terrify us with the threat of gold contracts and gold at a premium, an article of merchandise rather than circulating money.

With from ten to fourteen thousand millions of debts—national, State, municipal, and private—in this country, all payable alike in silver and gold, it seems to me there will be demand enough for all the silver we now have or are likely to have under our coinage laws for many years to come, and that there is no use to which gold can be put which will make it a marketable commodity for other than the uses common to both kinds of coin.

If I am correct, it follows that coined silver is equal in value to coined gold though its bullion value is less.

With such a change in our commerce as to make a balance against us in our dealings with other countries, I must admit that there might be created a market for gold for export capable of bringing it to a premium. Continued assaults upon silver may eventually create such a distrust of its monetary value as to cause its rejection by the people in ordinary business affairs and then bring gold to a premium.

In such event it will not be denied, at least by me, that the good of the great public will require legislation to correct the evil even to the extent of stopping the coinage of silver, for I can not conceive of a condition of permanent prosperity without a reasonably stable money with which to do business and measure property values.

It is sufficient to say we have not reached that condition and do not seem to be getting there very fast.

On the other hand we are gradually draining Europe of her gold and through that means forcing the nations to face the question of restoring silver to its place among their coins and to equality of value with gold.

With that restoration will come the time when we can safely open our mints to free private coinage.

Other agencies are at work in the same direction. Already it is claimed by some statisticians that the consumption of gold in the arts and for ornament in the Old World exceeds the production of the mines; that we are the only nation which is now increasing the gold coinage.

If this is true, there is nothing left for the commercial nations of Europe but a restoration of silver, or a readjustment of property values to conform to the diminished money supply with continued readjustment on a falling scale as the supply grows less and less and the population increases. No nation can face such a calamity and continue to exist.

I come now to the strongest argument which I have yet heard against the continued coinage of silver. And that is that the people have repudiated it; that they will not have it; that continued coinage is only to pile up silver in the Treasury vaults at a heavy cost to the Government without increasing the amount of circulating currency; that, pay it out as we will, whether in actual dollars or in silver certificates, it will flow back in a steady stream into the Treasury and leave none in the hands of the people, or in the banks as a part of their necessary reserve.

If this is true, then I admit we might as well stop the coinage until the people want and will take the money.

It needs no argument to show that a coinage which is not used either for circulation or for reserve adds nothing to a nation's money; in no way helps to maintain property values or foster business. It is as if it had not been.

It becomes a burden to the Government, for the benefit of mine owners only, an element of uncertainty, a breeder of distrust, a thing to be quickly put out of the way.

But is there any reasonable basis for this assumption, or is the wish of its proposers father to the thought?

Since the Bland act went into effect we have coined in round numbers two hundred and fifteen million silver dollars, not counting subsidiary coin. On the 1st day of November, 1885, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, more than 67 per cent. of this amount, either in coin or silver certificates, which amounts to the same thing, was in circulation—and by circulation I mean in the hands of the people—or in the banks as other money is in bank, either as a part of the reserve fund or of the amount which banks must always have on hand to meet the demands of depositors.

Coining this money at the rate of two millions of bullion per month, and keeping up the coinage month by month, more than one-half has gone out to the people and to that extent increased the money circulation of the country. The remainder is in the Treasury as a part of that great reserve fund which must always be kept on hand to meet the demands upon it and render secure the currency which the nation is responsible for.

On the 1st of last November there were outstanding, not in the Treasury, silver certificates amounting to $93,146,772; in the Treasury, other than the sum held for redemption of certificates outstanding, $70,670,770. It follows that the silver and certificates in actual circulation amounted to $144,329,230, or more than 67 per cent. of the coinage. And this in the face of the fact that at all times the Treasury Department has to the extent of its power discredited silver, joined in the cry against it, and helped to create distrust in the minds of the people; in the face of the fact that silver certificates have been largely of a denomination so large as to prevent their free circulation in business; in spite of the constant attempts to stop the coinage; in spite of the combined attacks from the great money centers of the country, and in face of their relatively smaller bullion value.

To my mind these facts furnish the most conclusive proof that the people needed this coinage, need more of it, and will use it if permitted to do so.

We have had presented elaborate statistics to show that the banks are already hoarding gold, that it is ceasing to circulate, that as fast as silver goes into circulation gold goes out in greater quantities, and that the result is a contraction of circulation, instead of expansion to keep up with increasing population.

Did it ever occur to those who make use of this argument that the banks do not willingly keep on hand more money than business prudence requires of them; that a certain proportion of these deposits must necessarily be kept in their vaults at all times; that national banks must keep good the legal reserves?

Did it ever occur to them that paper is a much more convenient medium for ordinary business than coin, much less subject to loss by wear, and that therefore paper is paid over the counter while they have it on hand, unless coin is asked for?

Will not these facts conclusively account for the gold in the banks without raising the presumption that they are hoarding gold?

My own experience leads me to believe that the banks frequently pay gold to customers who would prefer paper. The same experience leads me to believe that when gold is paid out it goes back to the bank quicker than paper in all those sections of the country where convenience requires a considerable sum of money to be constantly out in the hands of the people.

I therefore see no reason to believe that any class of sensible people in this country are hoarding gold to keep it out of actual use, and so working a contraction of currency.

For the reason which I have stated and for many others which might be given I have come to the deliberate conclusion that neither business, honesty, nor commercial prosperity requires a suspension of silver coinage; that a suspension at the present time would result in great shrinkage of values in property and increased values of credits; that it would therefore be class legislation in the interest of the strong as against the weak amounting to a crime; that silver, notwithstanding its diminished bullion value, has valuable and indispensable monetary uses, is desired and will be used by the people, ought to be continued in our monetary system, and will eventually be restored to its proper place in other nations; that because of discrimination against it abroad, and the consequent shrinkage in bullion value, we ought not to open our mints to free private coinage until conditions change, but in the mean time we ought to give a legal-tender quality to all silver certificates; that until we see more definitely the effect upon other countries of the present tendency of gold toward this country and the gradual decrease of the product of the mines we ought not to change the ratio of metal in the two coins. We can afford to await results with the confident assurance that only good will follow our action.

To give effect to these views will be the purpose of every vote which I may be permitted to record upon the questions involving them. [Applause.]

[Before the conclusion of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LONG. As my turn comes next, if the Chair will allow me to be recognized, I will give such time to the gentleman from Illinois as he may require.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the next recognition is promised on the other side for an hour.

Mr. LONG. I am on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. I would like to have three or four minutes to finish my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the gentleman will be recognized to complete his remarks.

There was no objection.

[Mr. ROWELL then resumed and concluded his remarks, as above.]

Mr. LAFFOON, Mr. Chairman, it has been my desire while serving as a member of this House in all things and on all occasions to be modest. Nothing but a conviction born of much thought and a sense of duty to myself and my people, whose views I am confident I represent, could induce me to occupy the time of this body. My conception of what constitutes a valuable Representative on this floor does not consist in declamation. The attention which he gives to the private wants of his constituency, and their individual needs, and a ready and willing response to their application for aid in matters affecting their personal interests, enter largely into the discharge of his duties.

I do not desire to be understood as intimating that great questions of national importance affecting the whole country should be overlooked or that we should fail, faithfully, cautiously, and intelligently, to guard the rights of the whole people.

Grave and considerate attention should be given to great national issues in order that we may be able to wisely direct the channel of legislation and aid the diversified interests of our great country.

Great questions of public interest take care of themselves. They do not need the aid of human genius or human effort. Individual will can not long prevail against ideas of public right. Parties form and divisions arise, antagonizing each other in matters of public importance, but the intelligence of the community under the shadow of our institutions assimilates and finally gravitates, after careful consideration, to a common basis on which the masses stand. Let no politician indulge in the folly that he is deceiving the American people. Their intelligence is quick to detect his error, and public sentiment, though for a time deceived, camps on his track and comes as a Nemesis to avenge its wrongs.

The question of silver coinage belongs to no section or no party of our common country. Whatever of good or ill grows out of the legislation of this Congress affects in a greater or less degree in some way all parties, all divisions, all localities of our common nationality.

Owing to the many phases of opinion on this subject I have heard it asserted by many members on this floor that it would be well for Representatives in this discussion to announce in the beginning of their speeches which side of this important question they occupied. For fear that when I have concluded mine some people may not understand exactly my position, I desire to announce for the benefit of those who have "ears and hear not" (and there are plenty of this class on this floor) that I am in favor of the unlimited coinage of the silver dollar of the same weight and fineness used by our fathers.

If this is not sufficiently explicit, let me say that I am in favor of the dollar of 412½ grains, 900 fine, and a free mint to everybody who seeks the coinage of American silver. I want no more to see the Government of the United States in the bullion markets of the world depreciating and underbidding for a metal which is one of the great productions of our country. I favor no royalty on coinage; I favor no seigniorage on coinage, but simply desire, so far as the mintage of the country is concerned, that silver shall be placed on the same footing with gold, and that hand in hand they shall go into the commerce of the world as twin brothers, winning wealth and protecting the financial honor of the nations that have fostered and maintained them. I do not expect when I announce my views for free coinage of silver that this declaration will unsettle the values of this or any other country. The French bourse will not be disturbed. The English will go on as usual. Mr. Bismarck, with his unending titles and with all of his imperial ideas, will continue to attempt to control the finances of his dominion according to his own monetary policy. The bonds of the United States will still command their regular premium, and stocks and other securities will still assert their value in all the money markets of the world, despite the expressed views of myself and the distinguished gentlemen who may differ from me or agree with me on the financial discussion pending in this Congress.

For twenty-five years the trend of American legislation in every department of life has been to make one man rich and another man poor. The rich man has grown richer and the poor man poorer. Fortunes have been amassed all over the land, not by industry, not by labor, not by honest speculation, not by legitimate gains, but by the mere force of legislation. The capital of the land has been exempted from taxation and the burden of supporting the Government has been heaped upon the labor, the productive industry, and the muscle of the country. Grand corporations have been formed, to which has been ceded out of the public domain an area of country almost as large as Cæsar ever ruled or as was ever swayed by the scepter of a Charlemagne. Added to these great cessions the Government has lent its credit to the extent of millions of dollars, on which it is annually paying interest, on bonds issued to enhance and enlarge their wealth. These corporations, built up and fostered by the Government, have grown insolent and are openly defying us in the courts of the country.

Financial legislation, unsettling values and opening up speculation to the money-kings of the country, has been the custom of law-making in this Capitol. The doors have been opened by legislation to those who have money and whose educated acumen enables them to take advantage of every opportunity thus afforded to speculate on the inert and misinformed farmer, mechanic, miner, and laborer who [illegible] their trades in the quiet walks of life, and who have no paid lobbyists in the corridors and galleries of this Capitol.

The poor people of America, upon whose shoulders has rested to a great extent the burdens of the support of the Government, have had more reasons to be dishonest than any people that I have ever known. Every inducement has been offered to them to repudiate the obligations of their Government, because they have been heaped mountain high on their shoulders by unjust legislation, as I shall attempt to show. The gallant Federal soldier, who had fought the battles of his country and placed his life at its disposal, came back after his bloody campaigns and found the money in which he was paid for his gallant and patriotic service in behalf of his country in the hands of speculators and money-changers who had grown rich on his and his country's misfortunes. The chivalrous confederate came home after defeat to build up his ruined fortune, and with a patriotism unprecedented allied himself with all the good elements who were willing to maintain the credit of the Government. Victory on one side was claimed and defeat on the other side was accepted, and both contending elements united by general consent in building up the waste places and in repairing the losses which the Government had financially sustained.

And let me say parenthetically that I would to God that all losses could have been restored. That the gallant soldiers who gave their lives in obedience to their conception of duty could be recalled from their honored graves. That that noble manhood which illustrated American character and devotion could be permitted to see our present pacification, and that the firesides in mourning, from the Gulf to the lakes, from Georgia to Maine, could be made happy by the presence of our dead soldiery. [Applause.]

The close of our unfortunate civil war found the country divided in sentiment and feeling, but a widespread disposition among the soldiers and civilians on both sides to heal the trouble and to maintain public credit and the honor of the nation by paying the public debt according to the terms of its creation. The public debt then in round numbers was stated at twenty-eight hundred millions of dollars. Our bonded indebtedness had all been created by virtue of the act of February, 1862, modified by subsequent acts previous to 1869, and it was well understood that three-fourths of said bonds were payable in the legal currency of the country. At the gold and silver rating of the bonds they had cost the holders not exceeding 50 cents on the dollar, and oftentimes the 50 cents has been paid in the sale of shoddy goods to the Government at immense profits for the use of the poor soldier, or in the profits on rich contracts made with the Government in its necessities as the war progressed.

The object of the bonds was to reduce the redundancy of the circulating medium and to secure the forbearance of the creditors of the Government in consideration of the interest to be paid according to the contract stipulated in the bond. I have never heard that any holder of those bonds claimed that they had been purchased with the coin of the country. They had all been bought with a depreciated currency and were to be paid back as the contract stipulated in the legal currency of the country. After this the Congress of the United States passed into the hands of the money-changers and legislation was invoked to create wealth in the hands of the few. The original contract was disregarded, the rights of the tax-paying community were overridden, and legislative aid given to build up fortunes accumulated at the cost of the toiling millions of the land.

The act of March, 1869, was passed. The act known as "the strengthening-credit act" became a law. By its terms a new contract was made between the people and the bondholder without any new consideration whatever, and the tax-paying people was made to assume an indebtedness which in terms they had never contracted. The bonds which were payable in the circulating currency of the country were made payable in the legal coin of the United States. By this act the debt of the nation was almost doubled, and in addition the power to pay was decreased in proportion in which the people were robbed of the medium in which bonds were to be paid.

For fear that my remarks may be too liberal to the bondholder and the manner of the creation of the original indebtedness of the Government, I desire to incorporate in what I have to say an extract from a speech made by a distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], which was carefully prepared by him years ago:

In 1862 the Government sold 6 per cent. 5-20 bonds to the amount of $60,982,450 and received for them greenbacks at their face, dollar for dollar. The demand now is that these bonds shall be paid in gold at their face, and yet, owing to the depreciation of greenbacks at the time of their purchase, only $44,030,649 in gold was paid for them. This makes a clear speculation of $16,951,801 in favor of the bondholder in this first transaction. On this clear speculation the bondholders have received interest for eleven years, amounting to $11,187,188, which, added to its principal, makes the sum of $28,138,989 already received in that single transaction for which not one dollar was ever paid.

In 1863 the Government sold of the same kind of bonds $160,987,550, for which it received an equal amount in greenbacks. A standard authority placed the average price of gold during that year at $1.58 in currency. It will thus be seen that these bonds cost their purchasers but $101,890,854 in gold, leaving a profit of $59,096,696, without including the interest. For ten years, however, the Government has paid interest on this naked profit, this principal, without any consideration. The interest thus paid amounts to $35,458,017, which, added to this fictitious principal, makes $94,555,713, now in the pockets of the bondholders on that year's operation, for which they never paid anything.

In 1864 the Government sold these bonds, amounting on their face to $381,292,250. Again the Government received only depreciated paper for these bond obligations, and at that time our currency was enormously depreciated, if tried by the gold standard. The price of gold during that year was at an average of 201 in currency. The sale of these bonds, therefore, which are now assumed to be gold bonds, only realized to the Government $189,697,636 in gold, less than one-half of their face value. There was left to the capitalists who speculated in them as purchasers the immense profit of $191,594,614. This was the amount of the broker's shave, and on it he has drawn interest from the people for ten years, amounting at this time to $114,956,768. Add this to its principal, which stands as pure speculation, and we find that the bondholders have made as clear gain, as something for nothing, the sum of $306,551,382 on the one year's transaction of 1864.

In 1865 the Government sold bonds to the amount of $279,746,150, on which it suffered a discount of $71,532,060 at the hands of the capitalists. The interest already paid by the people on this discount reaches $38,627,307, making this year's operation realize for the bondholders $110,159,367, for which not one cent was ever paid.

In 1866 the Government sold $124,914,400 of its bonds for which it received depreciated paper currency amounting to $88,591,773 in gold, according to the then price of gold. The difference between the face of these bonds and the amount they realized to the Government was $36,332,627. Eight years' interest received on this shave amounts to $17,434,556. Adding this interest and its principal together and we find that the bondholders have received $53,757,183 out of this year's sale of bonds, for which not one dollar ever left their coffers or reached the United States Treasury.

In 1867 the Government sold of its bonds the immense sum of $421,469,550. The purchasers paid for them $303,215,503, leaving a clear profit to them on the operation of $118,254,047. Taking the interest on this profit for seven years, amounting to $49,661,694, already paid, and the speculators have in their pockets, if these bonds are to be paid in gold, the sum of $167,915,741 on this year's brokerage, and for which they never gave a farthing in consideration.

In 1868 the Government sold its bonds to the still further amount of $425,443,800. Their purchasers paid $312,826,323 for them, clearing by that annual speculation the sum of $112,617,477. Add six years' interest on this bonus, amounting to $40,542,288, to the bonus itself, and we find that these traffickers in a nation's perils have received in this operation $153,159,765 of the people's money, for which not the slightest equivalent was ever paid into the United States Treasury.

In addition to the foregoing 6 per cent. bonds, the Government at different times during the years mentioned issued and sold $195,139,550 of bonds bearing 5 per cent. They realized to the Government $122,957,410, thus leaving to the purchasers a net profit of $72,182,140. Interest already paid on this profit amounts to $26,115,724, which, added to the profit itself, makes the sum of $98,297,864 as the amount now in the pockets of the bondholders growing out of their operations in the 5 per cent. bonds, and for which there is not the slightest consideration.

An account of the bondholders' clear profits arising from no investment at all may therefore be stated in the following tabular form:

1862	$28,138,989
1863	94,555,713
1864	306,551,382
1865	110,159,367
1866	53,757,183
1867	167,915,741
1868	253,159,765
On account of 5 per cent. bonds	98,297,864
Total	1,012,536,004

Notwithstanding this outrage we have to thank the patriotism of all classes of our people who stood by the credit of the country and submitted to the imposition placed on them by this unjust legislation. It brought bankruptcy and ruin to the people and financial disaster overtook the youthful enterprises which had been fostered and were then being built up immediately after the war.

In order to insure the further enslavement of the people to the money power of the country and to make sure that which was left uncertain by the strengthening credit act of 1869, the funding act of 1870 was passed by the terms of which the 5-20 bonds of the United States, which were payable in the legal currency of the country, was funded into what is known as the 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds, payable both interest and principal in coin. The people thought and had reasonable grounds to believe that the insolence of the money power would be appeased by this triumph of their aggression when by this legislation they had secured the change without consideration of the contract and compelled the payment in coin of bonds which were payable in another currency. The people again submitted, and the toiling millions came nobly to the front in time of peace as they had done in times of war to maintain the honor and the credit of the nation under the new financial régime which had been improvised to suit the money changes. The people had hoped and fondly desired that this was the end of moneyed aggression on their rights, and that the moneyed power would be content with this situation and seek only such speculation and profits as this new order of things afforded. Everything had been done which it had asked, and the people, with a valor, a willingness, and a resignation unparalleled in the whole annals of time, submitted and came again without a murmur to the rescue and maintenance of the credit of the Government. But wealth is greedy, aggressive, and always unsatisfied. It has no conscience in the pursuit of its gains. The good of the public, only so far as the necessities of capital require, never enter into its ideas of patriotism.

The capstone of financial iniquity was yet to be added to all this monument of financial oppression. Gold and silver were now the legal mediums for the payment of our public debt, and each were looked to with equal assurance for the discharge of both the principal and interest of our national obligations.

It is an accepted maxim of finance that when you decrease the means of payment you add to the burden of the obligation. The money of the struggling masses consisted in silver. It was the poor man's coin which enabled him to hold his own in discharging his humble indebtedness. The products from his farm, his mine, his workshop, was measured by this medium of exchange. It had been the dollar of his fathers, and he had not an idea, while in the pursuit of his industries in his humble home, that the Congress of his country would lay its hand upon the sacred dollar of his fathers.

Outrages enough had already been committed on the paying people of the country; but that insatiate greed of the money-changers still demanded another sacrifice, and an act surreptitiously passed through Congress known as the demonetization act of February, 1873, became a law. I will not stop to descant upon the manner of its passage. Permit me, however, to say that it was born under a shadow, and the manner of its birth as well as its purpose demand the execration and condemnation of all honest people. Without debate, without explanation, this law was passed; a horrid legislative monstrosity, which destroyed silver as a debt-paying medium and left gold alone as a money in which all our public obligations could be discharged.

The people, oppressed and burdened by taxation and financial depression, had certainly now a right to think the end of vicious legislation had been reached. But was this the case? With silver eliminated from the circulating medium of the country, with greenbacks in a disgraceful and doubtful condition, the resumption act passed in 1875 became a law. By its terms all debts, public or private, were to be payable after January 1, 1879, in coin, and that meant gold coin, as silver had already been demonetized. The results of this terrible contraction is fresh in the minds of the people. The poverty, disaster, and financial ruin which pervaded the whole country will not be soon forgotten.

The many who have been reduced by that act from affluence to pauperism will surely remember the terrible results which followed its passage. Fortunes—the accumulation of a lifetime—lost, the industries of millions of people paralyzed, beggars and tramps asking bread from door to door, "blighted homes, blasted hopes, and withered energies" are the living witnesses of the iniquity of this legislation. You read in natural history of the terrible anaconda that winds its folds around its victim, each moment making them tighter and more oppressive, until life is extinct, and then feeding upon the lifeless corpse it has made. In the financial legislation of this country it has no prototype. Except for the vitality and the patriotism of the American people and their innate love of the honor and integrity of the nation they would long since have become discouraged.

The coin act of 1869, the funding act of 1870, the gold act of 1873, and the resumption act of 1875 were enough to have discouraged any people on earth except the American people. When I consider their bravery, their forbearance, and their patriotism in the darkest hour of our financial history I honor them, and am proud that I am an American citizen; but I shall always blush with some degree of shame at the tardiness with which they punished the agents who supported the legislation that fastened these burdens on them. It was asserted while the discussion was going on in this House at the date of the passage of some of these acts by a distinguished gentleman who occupies a seat in the other end of this Capitol (Senator KENNA), that "the winds and storms may come, hurricanes may sweep over us, carrying death and destruction on their way, the fates may combine and visit upon us their redoubled furies, but American manhood, resisting oppression as a thing of evil, will rise from its thraldom and reassert the power that bids it to be free."

But the last feather had been put on the camel's back; the will of the people, unawed, undaunted, forced the passage of the act of 1878, which, despite Presidential vetoes and the protest of banking associations, became the law of the land. Limited coinage of silver, after a hard struggle, was restored to the people.

Even limited coinage is distasteful to the money-kings, and they are knocking at the door of this Capitol, after all of this disgraceful legislation, and asking for the suspension of silver coinage. In the light of this legislative history, ought we not to be cautious when we are again asked to suspend the coinage of one of the circulating mediums of this country?

Why suspend its coinage? Why not make its coinage unlimitable so far as American silver is concerned? Who are here asking this sort of legislation? Who are to be benefited by the passage of this sort of a measure? What classes of our people demand the suspension of silver? Are not these pertinent questions, and ought they not to be satisfactorily answered before we act in the premises?

Does the silver miner ask it? In some sections of our country this is almost its exclusive production. The wealth and industry of that people is vastly affected by the action to be taken by us in this matter. Suppose you should by legislation attempt to attack the industries of the Eastern States in the same way; a shout of indignation would go up on this floor and would be echoed in every hamlet and village in New England. The poor miner in the far West, who has braved the winters, who has fought the Indians, and who comes back and lays the result of his labors at the door of the Treasury of the United States, protests against the suspension of silver coinage.

The farmer, the mechanic, and the poor man of the country do not ask the suspension of silver coinage, but are begging at the doors of this Capitol for its unlimited coinage. Can we as the Representatives of the whole people disregard these protests in obedience to the demands of he money-power and creditor class of this country? Can we consent, when the Government, the States, the cities and towns, the public and private corporations, and the people are so deeply involved in public and private indebtedness, to decrease their means of payment by destroying or deteriorating the value or amount of this coinage. But it is said that the silver dollar is not an honest dollar, and that if the Government permits its bonds and the other obligations of States, corporations, and its citizens to be paid in this coin it will be a party to repudiation.

There is not a member on this floor who will assert that there is a bond of this Government that is not payable in the coin of the country. Every law which has been passed by the Congress of the United States under and by virtue of which our bonds have been issued expressly provides for their payment in the coin of the country. Every bond so issued was well understood to be payable in the legal coin of the country, including silver as well as gold, and every purchaser of them was as well aware of the terms of the contract at the time of the purchase as now. These bonds, payable as they are, are quoted in the markets at a premium of more than 20 cents on the dollar, and if the bondholder is tired of his trade with the Government why does not he sell his bond, for which he paid $1,000 and on which he has been collecting his semi-annual interest in gold since his purchase, for $1,200 and then retire to his coupon-clipping room and curse his Government for repudiating its honest obligations, instead of coming here and burdening this Congress with his grievances and saddening its membership with the mournful recitals of his financial troubles?

But it is said that many of these bonds were purchased after the demonetizing act of 1873, and when silver was not a legal coin of the country, and that these purchases were partly made by widows, orphans, and the saving institutions of the country, and if we permit them to be paid in depreciated silver coinage we simply tolerate legal robbery of the widowhood and orphanage of the land. This argument and appeal to this House will be quite insipid when their securities can so easily be disposed of to-day at immense profits. But even if this was not the case what sympathy ought this appeal to excite in this body. Widows and orphans who are able to own Government bonds deserve less the care of this Congress than widows and orphans who have to pay them, and when we legislate on subjects like this do you not think we had as well take care of the numerous poor as the few who are rich and who are able to take care of themselves? But in addition to all this can there be any equity in favor of any holder of the bonds of the Government requiring them to be paid in gold? I do not intend to cite any legal authority for the reason that I am addressing a body largely composed of lawyers, and who I am confident will not controvert the accepted legal proposition which I am about to announce.

No equity can arise out of a contract which would annul or destroy one of its plain provisions or an expressed and definite law under which the contract was made. If a hardship should occur which could not have been foreseen or provided against when the contract was made, then there will arise an equity in favor of the injured party. But in all these transactions between the Government and its creditors the law has been well understood, the terms of the contract have been well defined, and no party except the people has been injured by the transaction. I except from this assertion the people, the tax-paying people, who seem not to have had much to do with all these matters unless you consider the payment of the debt a matter of moment in the transaction. They have had this part of it to attend to, whether they were consulted about the contract or not.

The policy of the money-power is to put silver on the retired-list without a pension; silver protests that it is not sick; that while it has been in the military and civil service of the country for nearly a hundred years it is not superannuated; that while in all the bloody contests of the nation since 1792 to the present time it has been a noble soldier in war and an "offensive partisan" in peace in maintaining and protecting the honor and credit of the country, it has never received a disabling wound or contracted a disease while in active service, and now it insists that it ought to maintain and keep the original rank that it took nearly one hundred years ago, and which it has preserved with untarnished honor and unbesmirched integrity during the dark period of our country's history.

I have here to assert that the silver dollar just as it is now coined, I mean so far as the quantity of pure silver contained in a dollar is concerned, has been the dollar since 1792, and that during the entire period from that time until the demonetization act of 1873 it held its standing as money and was at a premium over gold in all the markets of this country.

I append here a carefully prepared table showing the relative value of gold and silver, covering a period of eleven years, from 1865 to 1876, passing through the time anterior and subsequent to the passage of the demonetization act of 1875:

1865 it was	103.32
1866 it was	103.63
1867 it was	102.67
1868 it was	102.57
1869 it was	102.47
1870 it was	102.67
1871 it was	102.57
1872 it was	102.25
1873 it was	100.40
1874 it was	98.86
1875 it was	96.43
1876 it was	89.12

It will be seen by reference to this table that from 1865 to 1872 silver was at a premium over gold, and if we were to profit by the experience of history would have remained so except for the legislation to which I have referred. But the money-changers say that we will lose our credit with the outside world, we will forfeit our financial honor if we agree to a double standard. I desire to insert here another table which has been carefully compiled, and since it has been so often used on this floor without dispute, I take it will be accepted as a true statement of the facts contained in it. It exhibits the nations that use the silver standard, the double standard, and the gold standard.

This exhibit shows that in the civilized commercial world 770,000,000 of population use silver alone, 187,000,000 use both silver and gold, and 87,000,000 use gold alone as a legal-tender money. The policy and purpose of the money-changers are to commit us to the gold standard, when we are the silver-producing country of the world—commit us to the policy of legislating against one of our chief products and the favored money of the people. This legislation so far as population is concerned is in the interest of the 87,000,000 against the 956,000,000 in round numbers. We are ably backed in the fight for silver by the vast majority of the world. I am not willing that imperial Germany shall bring us into the financial struggle against republican France. Aristocratic England should not be a factor in dictating our financial policy. We have a country that has become the feeder of the world. With the aid of almost every latitude of temperate climate, our diversified industries, our manufactories, our mines, English gold will seek our markets.

The American people never accomplished anything by cowardice; and when we yield to a financial policy which is wrong, which we ought by our situation to control, we are a set of cowards. I do not represent this kind of constituency, and do not intend to place them in that sort of a light before the American people.

The enemies of silver coinage in the light of all these facts claim that silver is a depreciated metal and that the silver dollar is no longer an honest dollar. How long have they made a fight against silver in order to produce this argument in favor of its demonetization? The skill and ingenuity of the bankers and subsidized statesmen have exhausted themselves in improvising weapons to depreciate it in all the markets of the country. The halls of legislation, the Departments of the Government, the press, stump orators, great conventions of bankers, bondholders, and the aggregated wealth of the sections have neglected no opportunity to assail this heavy metal of our fathers in every conceivable way and on all occasions.

During this long and desperate struggle against silver it has maintained itself in this unequal contest against all odds, sustained by the implicit confidence which the civilized world had in its certainty as a measure of value. The ordeal through which it has passed can but create the impression in the minds of its friends that "it has come to stay." The successful resistance which it has made to all these assaults of its enemies is the best evidence that it is the best money that the world has ever known. It is true that it may be inconvenient to bankers, to the officers of the Treasury, who are simply the servants of the people, and to the great money-changers of the land. It is true that the bloated bondholders may find it cumbrous and unwieldy when they clip their coupons and heap their glittering dollars around them in their ease and luxury. But let me ask this House if the Congress of the United States has not been sufficiently used to meet their every want and every desire? Is it not true that they have piled up fortunes mountain-high not from legitimate gain or from honest industry or speculation, but from advantages acquired by legislation which they themselves improvised and obtained?

Has not the time come in the history of this country when we should begin to consider the interest of the poor man, from the sweat of whose brow the Government finally draws its sustenance and support? You find them driving their plows a-field, in the workshops, the furnaces, and delving in the mines of the country day by day in order that they may shelter their frugal families by night. Their humble industries in time of peace furnish the great staples that maintain the life of the nation, while the bondholder, with his exempted wealth, contributes nothing, comparatively, to the support of the Government. In times of war they are not speculators on the bounty of the country. The plow stands idle in the furrow, the sound of the anvil, the pick, and the loom are hushed, and the sturdy tread of these bold defenders of their country is heard on the ragged edge of battle. They are the people to whose industries, whose muscle, whose brain power the Government looks to pay its national debt. I am here as their friend to aid them in their unexampled effort to be honest and in their struggle to maintain their nation's financial honor, and I will not be a party to the crime of crippling their resources by any legislation looking to the suspension of siver coinage, and in the name of the constituency I represent and the laboring people of the whole country I enter my solemn protest against its suspension and demand for them its unlimited coinage. [Applause.]

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, the question of silver coinage affects every man, woman, and child in this country. Gold and silver are the great metal moneys of the world. Money is the measure of value both of property and labor. Money is called the sinews of war in time of war, and upon the same principle should be called the life-blood of a nation in time of peace. A sufficient quantity of money compared with population and wealth is as essential to the support and happiness of man as the air we breathe or the bread we eat, and we, the representatives of the people, have as much moral right to deprive them of one as the other.

Gold and silver are the gifts of God to man, and are the natural metals out of which to coin money, by which the value of all else is measured. When plentiful the poor man does well. When scarce the rich man does well and the poor man suffers. Gold and silver have been used as money in all ages and in all countries, and will continue to be used so long as governments exist and recognize the interests of the people.

Under our Constitution it is the duty of the President to submit his views upon all questions of public policy to the Congress of the United States. At the opening of the present one his excellency, among many others, recommends the suspension of the coinage of standard silver dollars. Not temporary suspension, Mr. Chairman, but indefinite suspension—in effect a repeal of the silver-coinage law. The question for us, as the Representatives of the people, is, "Shall we obey his commands?" With due deference to his opinions, I, for one, shall not. To break down or impair one-half of the metal money of the world would not only be a grave mistake but an outrage upon the rights of the people.

It would indeed be a splendid scheme for the bondholders, national banks, money brokers and lenders, but extremely oppressive upon the debtor class and working people of this country. Mr. Chairman, it reminds me of the boy's answer to his father after he had given him a graphic description of the goodness of God in the formation of the crane. The old man said to his son, pointing out the picture of a crane, "See how good and wise the Lord is; He has given the crane a long, slim neck, a long, sharp bill, long legs, and a broad web foot. With his long legs he can wade the water, with his broad web foot he can hold down the fish until he reaches down with his long neck and sharp bill and takes him in for food." The boy, much impressed, but with an eye to both sides of the question, said, "Yes, father, that is mighty nice for the crane but it is h—l on the fish." [Laughter and applause.] So in this case, to destroy one-half of the metal money would be very nice for the bondholder and creditor class, but it would be exceedingly detrimental to the balance of the people. But the advocates of a gold standard insist that it would be better for the poor man to have gold only—honest money in other words—better for the laboring classes to have money scarce than to have it plentiful. Every man's experience contradicts such an absurd proposition.

We all know that when money is plentiful business of all kinds flourishes and labor finds ready employment at remunerative prices. Under such a state of things the people are contented and happy. But reverse the order; let money be scarce, business dwindles away, labor ceases to find employment, property and farm products become cheap and dull sale. What money there is ceases to circulate. Those who have it are afraid to let a dollar go. One general gloom and discontent spreads over the entire people; they lose faith in the soundness of their Government and the honesty of their rulers.

Mr. Chairman, this is strange doctrine, indeed. The people of this country are too intelligent to believe in such sophistry; they know it to be a fact, that with a silver dollar they can pay one hundred cents of debt and can purchase as much of the necessaries of life as with a gold dollar. They know that they can travel as far and fare as well upon any steam-vessel or railroad with a silver dollar as with a gold dollar. With it they can pay as much tax, State or Federal, as with a gold dollar. I would feel much obliged to any friend or advocate of gold only, if he will point out or name a single article either of necessity or luxury in this country that a silver dollar will not procure as much of as a gold dollar. If this is true, how, in God's name, does the silver dollar wrong the poor man?

And again, Mr. Chairman, the gold-standard gentlemen say that our silver dollar is a dishonest dollar, a clipped dollar, a so-called dollar, only worth in the great money markets of the world 79 or 80 cents, and therefore wrong to impose it upon the people. This allegation can not be supported by the facts, for there is as much fine silver in the standard silver dollar of to-day as there was in 1792, or at any time since that date, and its purchasing power is 25 per cent. greater now than in 1870, when it was above par with gold, as will be shown by the following table:

Articles.		Year ending June 30—

And these champions of gold—national banks and bondholders; in short, Wall street—have the audacity to proclaim to the country that it is dishonest and bad faith for a great government like ours to force her creditors to accept this depreciated coin in payment of her just debts. Mr. Chairman, I ask this plain, simple question: Is it dishonest or bad faith to pay a debt either public or private according to the terms of the contract? Every honest man will answer, no. Then, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact not to be disputed that when these contracts were entered into, gold and silver were legal-tender money of the United States, and in each of these contracts the Government stipulated to pay the amount named in coin, the law in force at that time being a part of the contract. What lawyer can or will say that the payment of these obligations in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the Government, would not be a strict compliance with both the letter and spirit of the contract? All know it would, and none can deny it. Then where is the bad faith? No one can see it but the greedy bondholder.

Mr. Chairman, let us put the boot on the other foot and see how it would work. Suppose one of these sacred creditors of the nation should owe the Government $100,000, payable in coin of the United States, instead of the Government owing him, and he should tender payment in legal-tender standard silver dollars, and the Government refuse upon the ground that their bullion value in the great money markets of the world—in London if you please—was only worth 80 cents on the dollar, and therefore, demand payment in gold, what do you think this untaxed honest bondholder would say, and especially if his debt was drawing 4 or 5 per cent. interest? No one doubts his reply. Would he not say, and would he not have the legal and moral right to say, that his debt was payable in coin, and that silver is a coin of the United States and was when he made his contract?

But concede, for the sake of argument, that silver is a depreciated coin, and only worth 80 cents on the dollar. Who caused this depreciation? Was it the people, the debtors? No, indeed, I answer, what all know to be true, that it is the result of an unholy and wicked combination and crusade upon it by bondholders foreign and domestic, national banks, money-kings, and money-gamblers, for the sole purpose of increasing the purchasing power of their own wealth. No one knows better than the bondholders that if they can succeed in driving one-half or even one-third of our circulating medium from use, their wealth, consisting as it does largely in untaxed bonds of the Government, will be increased at least 50 per cent. The value of money consists in its power to control people and their property, and as these bondholders have been a party to this intolerable outrage upon humanity they ought not to be allowed to take advantage of their own wrong.

In the face of all this, these gold worshipers insist that in the continued use of silver in paying off our obligations, we cheat these sainted creditors out of 20 cents on the dollar—in other words, pay them coin only worth 80 cents in gold. If this be true, it seems never to have occurred to them that we are swindling the laboring classes, who toil day in and day out, not a few hours at the office desk or counting-room, but from sun-up until sun-down—and that too, either under the scorching rays of the summer sun or before the cold blasts of the winter winds—out of much more.

Mr. Chairman, to this swindling process let us apply the Democratic maxim, "the greatest good to the greatest number," and see how the account stands.

The census of 1880 show about 17,000,000 money earners. Of this vast number, in round numbers, about 3,324,000 are agricultural or farm laborers; about 1,075,000 domestic or house servants; about 1,800,000 common laborers; about 3,834,000 mechanics, miners, railroad employés, &c.; altogether about 10,100,000. Now suppose this vast army of laborers earn $10 per week per head; this gives us something over one hundred million per week paid to them in dollars worth only 80 cents; a clear loss to each of $2, and an aggregate loss of $20,000,000 per week—more than twice the amount paid to the bondholders in the way of interest in a whole year.

So if this is a correct rule, these laborers lose twice as much each week as the bondholders in the way of interest in a whole year. While the bondholders would lose ten millions in a year the laboring people would lose twenty millions in one week, or for a year of fifty-two weeks no less than $1,040,000,000—almost a sum equal to our entire national debt.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, who is it that is crying out fraud against the silver dollar? Certainly not this vast army of farmers, mechanics, and laborers. No, indeed; not them. All we hear from them is give us more silver money, employment at remunerative rates, and a good market for our produce. They, Mr. Chairman, honor the dollar of their fathers and are willing to stand by them throughout all time. They believe, and so do I, that we ought to have free and unlimited silver coinage, at least of American production; they believe, and so do I, that the large surplus now in the Treasury of both gold and silver should be applied to the payment of the national debt that is drawing interest and is payable at the option of the Government; then there would be no more complaint about iron vaults to hold it. Pay it out on the debt and stop the interest and let it seek Southern and Western investments; it will receive a hearty welcome and remunerative fields. Our people are tired paying heavy taxes in the way of high duties on the necessaries of life, and seeing the money drawn from circulation and locked up in the Treasury as dead capital, and $200,000,000 of the public debt outstanding bearing interest that can be paid any day. They want to see their taxes reduced or the money applied to the payment of the public debt and the interest stopped. In God's name, give us one or the other.

The quantity of money for our country depends upon the output of our gold and silver mines, our coinage laws, and the balance of trade.

But, Mr. Chairman, the President, the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, and the friends of their policy urge and insist that if we continue the coinage of silver, it being the cheaper metal, it will drive gold out of the country and leave us with nothing but cheap silver, and when the balance of trade is against us we will have no money with which to pay. While this is the most plausible argument presented by them, yet, Mr. Chairman, with due deference to this very high and reliable authority, I think this argument can be successfully answered in two ways. First, if we are to judge the future by the past, it is not true in point of fact; for, Mr. Chairman, it will be admitted that in 1878, when the Bland act, as it is called, became the law and the recoinage of silver was partly resumed, the same reason was then urged by the gold men and most frightful results predicted.

Now, sir, we have had eight years experience; not a fair test, because it will be conceded that each and every Secretary of the Treasury was and the present one is, hostile to silver coinage. The execution of a law by unfriendly hands is almost no execution at all; but, notwithstanding this, let us take the official reports of the Treasury Department from 1878, the date of the Bland act, to the present and see how the gold has been driven from our shores by silver. The following table, furnished Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, by the Director of the Mint, showing the imports and exports of gold and silver coin and gold and silver bullion for the eight years last past, is as follows:

Imports and exports of coin and bullion into United States.

Fiscal years.	Imports of gold coin and bullion.	Exports of gold coin and bullion.	Imports of silver coin and bullion.	Exports of silver coin and bullion.
1878	$12,976,281	$9,304,455	$16,400,899	$24,535,670
1879	5,624,948	4,567,614	14,671,053	20,409,827
1880	80,758,396	3,639,025	12,275,914	13,503,894
1881	100,031,259	2,565,132	10,344,238	16,841,715
1882	34,377,054	32,587,880	8,093,336	16,829,509
1883	17,734,149	11,600,988	10,692,242	20,219,445
1884	22,831,317	41,081,937	14,594,945	26,051,426
1885	26,691,696	8,477,892	16,550,627	33,753,633
	301,025,100	113,744,843	103,914,963	172,145,209

From this table it will be seen that since the coinage of standard silver dollars was resumed in 1878, we have imported in gold coin and bullion the sum $301,025,100, and have exported the sum of $113,744,843, proving conclusively that during this period we have imported $187,280,257 more in gold than we have exported.

The same table shows that during the same period we have imported of silver coin and silver bullion the sum of $103,914,843 and have exported the sum of $172,145,200, proving just as conclusively that during that period we have exported from this country $68,230,247 more in silver than we have imported. If this official statement is to be believed, instead of silver driving gold out, gold has driven silver out—the very opposite to the prediction of the gold men.

But, Mr. Chairman, the truth is that neither is true; the coinage or non-coinage of silver has had but little if anything to do with it. The balance of trade that has been in our favor for that long period is the true cause. So gentlemen may rest easy upon that question, for just so long as the United States sells more produce and merchandise to other countries than she buys, imports of gold will be in our favor. This proposition is as plain and simple as if John Smith, a farmer, sells more produce from his farm in a given year than he pays out to produce it—he will have money left, and vice versa.

So as long as we, as a Government, sell more than we buy we need not fear that silver will drive our gold from the country, though we have free and unlimited coinage of both. Gold and silver are a part of the material wealth of the world, and seem by the unerring law of nature to develop and yield in proportion to the growth of the country and the wants of the people. When they are taken by the hand of labor in their crude state, they go upon the market as merchandise and so remain until transformed into money according to the laws of nations, each fixing its own standard and ratio. They circulate from country to country as bullion, but between individuals as money, dependent almost solely upon the laws of trade for their scarcity or plentifulness in a given country. Just how much in gold and silver coin and bullion exist in the world we are not advised. The following table, furnished Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, by the Director of the Mint in June last, shows the following:

Countries.	Gold coin and bullion.	Silver coin and bullion.	Total.
United States	$626,422,646	$269,665,758	$896,088,404
Great Britain and Ireland	583,500,000	95,000,000	678,500,000

Portugal	30,000,000	10,000,000	40,000,000
Germany	325,000,000	211,000,000	536,000,000
Austria	45,000,000	75,000,000	120,000,000
Sweden	15,000,000	5,000,000	20,000,000
Denmark	14,000,000	5,000,000	19,000,000
Netherlands	28,000,000	57,000,000	85,000,000
Russia	124,000,000		124,000,000
Turkey	40,000,000	35,000,000	75,000,000
Roumania	163,000	11,000,000	11,163,000
Total	3,032,785,646	2,625,365,758	5,658,151,404

From this table it will be seen that at that date the United States had a fair proportion of the gold and silver coin and bullion of those countries, population considered. But how it will stand with any of them one year hence no mortal man can tell. It will not depend upon the coinage or non-coinage of silver alone, but upon the natural laws of supply and demand. Each country should coin her own production of both gold and silver and add it to the grand volume of the metal money of the world; it will take it all to keep up with the railroad speed of population and trade. Each country enters the great battlefield of commerce, each contending for supremacy, and in this grand struggle for supremacy in trade the volume of money fluctuates and shifts from country to country, as the balance of trade preponderates; that country with the best natural resources, the most energetic and industrious people, the best diffused circulation of money, the lowest burdens in the way of taxation, and the cheapest transportation, comes out winner. Ours being new, overflowing with natural wealth, with her sixty million intelligent and industrious people, will soon stand in the front rank if we, their representatives, will legislate in their interest, instead of in the interests of corporations, foreign and domestic, national banks, bondholders, and money and produce gamblers.

Mr. Chairman, the great scarcity of money in many parts of our country is not altogether traceable to a want of money in the United States, though the amount per capita is too small; it is to the condition of it. There is too much drawn from the people by way of taxation and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury and there remains dead capital. It should be paid out upon our interest-bearing bonded debt, except a small reserve. Reinvestment in Government securities should be made less remunerative by levying an income tax. Then the money, instead of being reinvested in bonds of the Government, would seek Southern and Western investments and thereby revive business and relieve the people.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say that while I do not impugn or impeach the motives of any official or any one else upon this great question, yet I must say, in all candor as a Representative, that I regard the present war upon silver as an unpardonable outrage upon the rights and interests of the great mass of the people. But, thank God, they have the power and ought and will assert it. [Applause.]

Mr. LE FEVRE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to a suspension of silver coinage by the Government.

I am well aware that this system of free coinage of silver is exceptional, but our financial condition is exceptional.

Before entering upon this let me state my views on money, that have cleared the way, for me at least, to the conclusion that controls my vote. I regard money in the shape of coin as something different in its nature from a circulating medium. As I read history, it appears to me that away back in the early ages of commerce the trading world fixed on coin, gold and silver, as a measure of value, through which to facilitate the exchange of commodities. Having determined the unit of value—as the yard-stick, the bushel measure, and the pound weight, fixed that of length, quantity, and weight—the measure became an abstract idea. It so remains to-day. If all the gold and silver were taken from the world now—as they are, in fact, practically removed—the idea of measure would remain. When, for example, I offer for sale some article of trade, say a beef, I measure the value of the animal at $30. I get in exchange some wearing apparel that the manufacturer tells me is worth $30, or say $20, and the difference is paid me in what we call money, but what is in fact a circulating medium furnished by the Government as such, and measured in value precisely as the beef and clothes are.

Here we see that we are dealing with two separate and entirely distinct things—the measure of value established by trade and recognized by humanity the world over, and a circulating medium furnished us by the Government to facilitate exchange of commodities—and all our trouble comes, Mr. Chairman, from confounding the two. That quality which makes coin—gold especially—a measure of value, as it is claimed, prohibits its use as a circulating medium, for that quality comes of its scarcity. It is valuable because it is rare and has in its intrinsic worth not only this rarity but the value which comes from its uniformity. A circulating medium to be of use must be abundant, but our opponents claim that if gold can be made abundant it loses its value for all else.

Now, the condition of the trading world to-day is exceptional, as I have said, for one of the precious metals, silver, has been found in such quantities that while retaining, in part, its well-established character as a measure of value, it is abundant enough to afford us a circulating medium. For this purpose our opponents, popularly known as gold-bugs, tell us it shall not be used. It will drive gold, they tell us, out of circulation, and, making us a silver people, destroy our credit. Now, gold is not and never has been a circulating medium, and what its presence or absence has to do with our credit is something I can not understand. Credit means confidence in a power to pay, and this power depends entirely on what one has to sell or, in other words, the property which represents the credit, and that is not either the measure of value or the circulating medium. We resumed specie payment—that is, the Government regained its lost credit on the produce sent to Europe, which Europe was ready to receive and pay for, not in bullion, for there was not enough in the world to carry on one day's transactions, but in the exchange of commodities that revived our trade and put us again on the high road to prosperity; a prosperity, Mr. Chairman, that has not continued because, through the control of these very gold-bugs, now fighting us on this floor, it is so arranged that all the immense labor of this land which goes out, or is sold at home in the shape of products of the earth, returns to fatten a few while the many suffer. If to foster wealth in the hands of a minority; if to fill the country with millionaires on the one hand and a vast mass of suffering labor on the other; if to dot the land with castles for capitalists, and cover it with hovels for labor, is prosperity, we are prosperous. We have reached in a hundred years the level found in Europe in a thousand. In common with the peculiar prosperity of the shores from which our fathers fled because they were poor laborers, we have wiped out the class of citizens contented with a competence, and left a gulf that widens every day between the very rich and the very poor.

This, however, is a subject somewhat foreign to the issue now pressed forward in this matter of a circulating medium.

It is the duty of the Government to furnish the people with a circulating medium. It can not make money, for that pertains not to the law-making power, and means only a measure of value. This the Government can not change in any way, for such change means to destroy.

I repeat, it is the duty of the Government to furnish a circulating medium that we call money. This ordinarily is coining the credit of the Government, or rather of the country itself, that is put out in paper, measured by the measure of value, for every note sent out is not stamped as a dollar, but has on the face of it a promise to pay the dollar on demand. Because this demand is seldom made we have fallen into the error of considering it money itself. I do not go so far as the bullionists or hard-money men in asserting that this paper differs from coin in the fact that it has no value. It has a value that may be considered intrinsic, that comes of the power of the Government, or rather the wealth of the country, which assumes shape in the Government itself.

The right, or rather duty, of furnishing a circulating medium has been in a measure farmed out to our two thousand corporations known as national banks. These corporations by a purchase of bonds get the right to issue their own notes as money, and that which our opponents deny to the Government itself is given to these creatures of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not in this placing myself in opposition to our present banking system. While defective in many respects and dangerous to the welfare of the people unless carefully guarded, I am prepared to admit that it is proving itself the best system of banking we ever possessed. Compared with the old system of State banks, out of which it grew, it seems perfection. We are forced to see, however, that it is not only not perfect, but if we do what these banks advocate in the measure before us this system of banking is likely to end in being a curse instead of a blessing. We know that it was called into existence by the late Salmon P. Chase, when Secretary of the Treasury, as a war measure that was to end with the war. Being based on the war debt, the system can not survive the existence of that debt, and one motive felt upon this floor, and which gives life and force to the measure before us, is to be found in a desire to continue the debt that we may continue the banks. Any accumulation of money in the Treasury is viewed with alarm, and the objection to a further free coinage of silver is based on a fear that the silver so accumulated may be used for the redemption of the bonds.

There is another and yet stronger motive that animates these financiers who represent the banks, and that is the check which such free coinage puts on the power these corporations possess of swelling the currency when it is not needed, and so stimulating speculation, and contracting the currency when it is most needed by the people to facilitate trade.

To understand this, Mr. Chairman, we should remember that a banker means a man who has money to loan—at least in times back such was the correct definition. To-day, however, it would seem that a banker is a man who seeks to borrow. But not to dwell on that but to get at what I mean to say, which is that accepting the old time-honored term, a banker means a man whose main business is to loan money. A corporation, then, duly organized, opens its doors to the trader who, needing loans for immediate operations, seeks that source of supply. He deposits his note, duly indorsed, and gets in return, what? Not money but the banker's promise to pay money, which, with the Government's indorsement, passes as a circulating medium. The banker is highly favored. On the United States bonds he holds the Government pays him a handsome interest, and on the notes which he issues, through loans, he exacts handsome interest, so that he is paid both ways; and for what? To furnish a currency which could be had by the people without cost but for the process that is carried out through these corporations.

It is said that it would be dangerous to have the Government go into a banking business. Certainly it would. But as for a banking business which means receiving money on deposit and loaning it, I have not yet met a man who proposes that this shall be done by the Government. To issue its notes receivable as taxes to serve as a currency is not banking in any sense of the term, and this is precisely what we demand of the Government; no more, no less. The war now made on silver is precisely the same war that is and has been made on greenbacks; and this says, in so many words, that the entire power and all the privilege of issuing currency shall be surrendered to these corporations.

I am opposed to this. I am opposed to it on the very grounds which the bullionists assert they occupy, and that is, the danger of inflation. The Government, as I believe I can show, can not inflate—to use the term in its proper sense—but the banks can.

Confounding money as a measure of value and money used as a currency, we are told that to swell the volume of currency is to inflate currency. The same voice that tells us this gets hoarse in asserting that paper currency is not money, but only so many promises to pay money, and yet we are called on to believe that swelling the volume of such affects what it only represents in the form of promises. If it were proposed that the Government should do a banking business, that is, receive money on deposit and loan the same for business purposes, this would be true. But what is the real meaning of inflation? There is a popular superstition that an increase of currency is an increase of money, and, as I have said, affects prices. Is this true? I believe not.

When a man places his note before a banker, or in other words upon the market, what is the measure of its value? Certainly not the scarcity or abundance of money, as we are generally told. It is measured by the credit of the man who signs the note, that is, his character as a business man and the property he is known to possess subject to seizure and execution in case he fails to meet his obligation. This is the measure of his promise to pay. The same properties pertain to the note of the Government; no more, no less. Now the Government may put out its credit in this shape in payment of its debts. It is guarded by this. About the banks there are no such guards. They are governed by their business interests; and the inflation we have to fear from that source is not of currency but of credit. If we study this system of banking we find this to be the fact. When times are good, as it is called, loans are easy and abundant, credit is stimulated unnaturally, and currency is plenty. We have inflation. But pay-day comes, as it must come, and the banks begin calling in their loans, refusing further accommodations, and there is a contraction of the currency.

Now, sir, this is a power not held by the Government, and a dangerous power to confer on corporations. The debts contracted in the inflation of credit, remain through a shrinkage of value that comes from the contraction of the same credit, and the same power that built up the debts, stimulating and encouraging credit, becomes its most cruel and deadly enemy.

I repeat, this is a power not possessed by the Government. The Government may go to its furthest limit in issuing currency, called more properly a circulating medium, without in the slightest affecting prices or stimulating trade. I know that this is denied. But let me illustrate: The Government may fill a man's house with its circulating medium, nay, sir, it may pack that mansion, not with greenbacks but with gold and the owner of this wealth will not take five dollars and purchase a barrel of flour, until he finds where he can place it at five dollars and twenty-five cents. The Government does not undertake to find him such a market. It offers no inducement and stimulates no trade. But a bank does. The officers and directors offer loans for speculative purposes. Half the time they seek such themselves. All the gambling in values that makes Wall street possible and a wheat-pit at Chicago a fact comes of this power given by our Government to a few corporations. This impairs credit and makes our markets uncertain, and sets our business men to gambling. Three-fourths of this business in its healthiest condition is done on credit. Farming out to corporations the great power of the Government to furnish a currency, and adding thereto, as I have said a privilege not in the Government, of contraction and expansion, we have undermined and nearly destroyed our prosperity as a people.

To illustrate the practical workings of this system I read you a letter written me some time ago by a friend in whose intelligence and judgment I have much confidence. It is as follows:

MY DEAR LE FEVRE: The great Mirabeau has said that to succeed in life one has to learn much from those who know less on any given subject than we do. I have of late been getting instruction from the most ignorant of all people on the matter I have been looking into. You know that I was brought up in the Democratic, Benton, hard-money school. I have believed until now that the only safe currency for a people is found in coin, and that a note of either Government or corporation, especially of a corporation, was a curse, and should be condemned if we hoped to prosper.

Well, I came here to this rural region to spend the balance of my days, full impressed with the hard-money doctrine. I came in the midst of this great financial depression with all made stagnant. Now, my first discovery was that in the destruction of credit is a destruction of confidence, and any trade to be carried on must be on a cash basis. Well, the farmers have no money. They purchase all they need, and get their mechanical work done on credit at our little village here through the year, until their crops are available, and these they haul in, sell at the warehouse, take the checks and pay off the year's indebtedness. This depression comes, and the farmer goes, as usual, to the merchant to purchase his calico, blankets, and wearing apparel, and the merchant says: "I am very sorry, but I must have cash for these things. The merchant I buy of in New York will not give me credit, must have the money, and so, in turn, I must have cash." The poor farmer has no money—he never had any—he has no means and so suffers for the necessaries of life. There is a money famine in the land.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in that plain, homely illustration lies all of this much-vexed question. A measure of value fixed by trade is one thing, currency is another, and so long as the Government retains its power of furnishing that currency, and uses its privilege liberally, all will be well. There is no better currency than silver, and the supply should continue.

As I have said, the war on silver is the same as has been and is being made against greenbacks, and the hostility comes from two sources, both powerful, both selfish, and both mischievous. We have, in the first place, the banks striving not only to relieve themselves of their balance-wheel that restrains excess—for so long as the Government issues all the currency necessary for business the contraction and expansion for selfish purposes on the part of these corporations is held, to some degree, in restraint—but they seek to prolong their existence by a continuance of our national debt, and this puts them in accord with that other party, the bondholders, who live in fear that these bonds may be liquidated in the much-denounced silver. These last see that under our form of government it is impossible to continue an unholy and unjust distinction which pays the bondholder in gold and all others in currency.

I represent here, Mr. Chairman, an agricultural district. It suffers, in common with all agricultural interests, from a lack of currency—money as it is called by this people—and I can not represent my people, I can not represent the better interests of the people at large, and consent to what is now proposed—that the Government shall abandon its great privilege of giving the people a safe circulating medium, and donate to these corporations a power that in their hands will be fatal to the progress and prosperity of the nation.

The Government, Mr. Chairman, can do very little for the people, whose creature it is, in the way of furthering their business. On the contrary, it can do a great deal of harm. An interest created by law is a poor thing. An interest fostered by law is no better. In all cases it means benefiting a class at the expense of all others. For twenty-five years we have had a paternal Government that professed to do everything for everybody, while in fact injuring all through its stupid and unconstitutional interference. The world awakens to the fact at last that all distress that curses earth comes from an unequal distribution of property. As a writer on political economy has tersely said: "We have the many who produce all and enjoy nothing, and the few who produce nothing and enjoy all." Against this evil free political institutions avail us nothing. The many may possess the ballot and live in rags; the few may have no political privileges differing from the masses and yet own the people to their ruin.

We boast of having the freest and best government under the sun; and yet under this Government landlordism prevails to a greater extent than under the heaviest despotisms of Europe. But yesterday a man died in New York, of whom we boasted that he died the richest man in the world. We destroyed the aristocracy of birth to create a meaner and more cruel aristocracy of corporations. We have a larger wealth concentrated in fewer hands than ever was known to the human race before. An ordinary mind can not grasp the amount of money invested in the railroads that cover our land and control the distribution of all its products. And yet this vast wealth is concentrated in the hands of a few men. This is but one item of the many, and I could go on for an hour in enumerating the mere list of these monopolies. The agricultural class, that I in part represent on this floor, is the greatest sufferer. I might, Mr. Chairman, treat this House to a novelty by such enumeration. Everything is discussed here except the material wants of the people and the woes of the poor.

While we deal out with a liberal hand laws affecting these interests and these troubles we discuss politics. We have members representing the Democratic party and members representing the Republican party, yet, looked at from the point of view which I have suggested, there is no member representing the people. There is distress in the land. All business, other than gambling, is paralyzed and on every side depressed. Labor is organizing and arming against capital. In the district I have the honor to represent the farmer can raise nothing that he can sell at a profit. The counties are being shingled with mortgages that can never be lifted. It is therefore an evil hour for the monopolists to appear here and propose to tighten their chains by a legal enactment that seeks to deprive the people of more money in the shape of the soundest currency ever known. [Applause.]

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some remarks on House bill No. 2293, introduced by myself, to promote agriculture.

Availing myself of the latitude of debate allowed in Committee of the Whole, I shall not confine myself to this subject exclusively, but shall have something to say upon subjects having a direct bearing upon the farming interests generally.

This bill is intended to enlarge the scope of duties of our consuls and commercial agents by requiring them to embrace in their reports to the State and Treasury Departments the subject of agriculture as well as of commerce and manufactures. In our legislation the industry of the farmers has to a great extent been subordinated to that of commerce, manufactures, and mining. It is the purpose of this bill to elevate this industry, and to put it on a level with the other great industries that have long received the fostering care of Government.

Under the present law our consuls are required to procure and transmit to the Department of State accurate commercial information of their districts, and to report the prices-current of merchandise as often as may be required to the Treasury Department. Now this bill would have them to procure and transmit through the same channels information of the condition and prospects, monthly, of the crops within the limits of their consulates, so that the facts may be compiled and embraced in the monthly bulletins of the crop reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture; and also to give at least once a year, or oftener if so required by the State Department, the prices-current of all such merchandise and farm products, orchard and garden, as are imported into the ports of their consulates, thereby giving to the farmers of our country a full knowledge of the character and quantity of the products of the soil of the countries where this Government has a consul, in order that our people may be informed as to when there may be a demand and a market for their surplus products of the soil and the prices current of the same. We can not give to the farmer too much information on this subject. And it is certainly the duty of the Government to do this much to advance so great and overshadowing an industry, particularly when it can be done at so small a cost. The agriculturists of the country must become more self-asserting and enforce their just demands for larger and broader recognition in the legislation of Congress. It is the duty of the Government to provide for this large and useful class of our population all such information as will entitle them to know where to find the best and dearest markets for their products and to remove as far as practicable all obstacles to their access to them. This becomes imperative in view of the fact that most of the farm products have tended downward for years in price and many of them have reached a price below which there is no margin above the cost of production.

Legislation should be directed to the end that the farmer be given the freedom of the open markets of the world and all proper facilities afforded him for the transportation and exportation of his products to any market, domestic and foreign. This very numerous class seeks no exclusive privileges, but only such as are enjoyed by every other class in the land. This they have a right to demand, and Congress should not deny it to them. The law should compel our consuls to gather and furnish this agricultural information, that the Commissioner may scatter it broadcast over the land.

There is no good reason why our consuls should confine their reports to the commodities exported from the countries to which they are accredited. Let them embrace all articles imported of considerable value, especially of the products of the soil, the mine, and the workshop, the character of farm tools used in cultivating crops, and whether of domestic or foreign manufacture. This will give our industrial population a better idea of the best markets for their surplus products, and when and where to export them. The masses need information on these subjects, and it is the duty of the Government to procure and furnish it. It can be done through Government agency at much less cost to the citizen than through private channels. A broad and liberal policy in this direction should be inaugurated and carried out.

The farms of the United States are worth more than ten billions, a larger sum than is invested in any other single industry, and the annual returns from these farms exceeds $3,000,000,000. The manufacturing industries of our country produce annually, in round numbers, five billions three hundred and sixty-nine millions, but more than half of this is the cost of raw material, leaving as the gross value of the products of manufacture one billion nine hundred and seventy-five millions—little more than one-half the value of the farm products. Agriculture furnishes employment to a greater number of laborers than any other occupation. About 52 per cent. of our entire population are engaged in this industry or are dependent upon it for a living. Of the seven million six hundred and seventy thousand farmers about four millions own the farms they cultivate, and nearly four millions are farm laborers. Let us dignify this great industry by giving to it a larger and broader recognition in the legislation of this body. Let tardy justice be done that class who toil in the field and the shop, and are the most law-abiding, patriotic, and useful class in the land. This country is pre-eminently agricultural, and in the very nature of things must continue to remain such.

The centers of agriculture have been constantly moving westward, partly in consequence of the rapidly exhausting fields and a want of a more scientific and intensive system of farming. Now, it is the duty of the Government to supplement the efforts of individuals to inaugurate and carry on a more scientific system of tillage by making appropriations for agricultural experiment stations. Our Government has done very little in this direction compared with what foreign governments have accomplished.

The world has been compelled to appeal to science in aid of agriculture. Agricultural chemistry is scarcely an hundred years old. It was about the beginning of this century that Sir Humphrey Davy began his investigations of vegetable physiology and the analysis of plants and soils. And soon thereafter the guano beds of Peru were discovered, and England, as she does in almost every thing calculated to advance her interests, took the lead in the use of this fertilizer.

About 1840 Baron Liebig published to the world the result of his researches into agricultural chemistry and experiments with various fertilizers. These experiments and scientific researches gave a fresh impetus to improvements in agriculture, and the contagion soon became widespread, so that every enterprising nation took it up and made those recently developed scientific truths tributary to further and greater development. No nation can now refuse to adopt and bring into use these scientific methods in farming without being left far in the rear of others in this march of progressive and scientific agriculture. In 1843 George Bennett Laws, of Rothamstead, England, established an agricultural experiment station for the purpose of testing seeds, soils, and fertilizers, as well as the different modes of planting, tillage, and experimenting with the various fertilizers. The results produced and the benefits to agriculture were so wonderful that Germany began to establish these experimental stations, and now has more than one hundred carried on under the direction and at the expense of the government. And almost every country in Europe has more or less of them.

Mr. Chairman, the Government has done so little for the farming interests that it will be more difficult to point out what it has done than to show what it has failed to do. In fact, the farmers of our country have asked but little of the Government, and that little has been doled out with a parsimonious hand. In the early settlement of the country our fathers found the virgin soil of unsurpassed fertility, and scarcely thought that it would ever become necessary to call upon the Government for aid. It was soon ascertained that a sufficiency of the farm products could be raised for home consumption and leave a surplus to go abroad. The value of these exports continued to increase until as early as 1820 they were found to constitute more than 80 per cent. of our entire foreign exports. And they have not since that time fallen below 70 per cent., except for the years 1864 and 1865, and have generally averaged from 75 to 85 per cent. of the whole export trade. It was the larger export of these products in the years immediately preceding resumption, in 1879, that made that financial policy possible.

The balance of trade during this period caused the precious metals to flow to our country in payment for these exports. Otherwise gold would have gone abroad to pay interest upon our indebtedness held by foreigners. The agricultural classes make up more than one-half of our entire population; they feed themselves and those of our people engaged in all other industries, and furnish the raw materials which, when woven into fabrics, clothe the masses, leaving the large surplus which goes abroad and forms the basis of our industrial prosperity.

It is reasonable to estimate that the farmers and tillers of soil pay one-half of all the taxes collected by the General Government. Now, what becomes of these taxes? Are they disbursed with any regard to equity? Are all classes and industries equally fostered and encouraged therewith? Let facts be adduced to testify. Since the organization of our Government there have been appropriated for the benefit of commerce, say the improvement of rivers and harbors, about one hundred and five millions; to railroad corporations, one hundred millions in Government bonds, principal and interest, and in public lands more than two hundred millions in value. Drawbacks have been paid to those engaged in the fisheries and in the manufacture of imported raw materials that were again re-exported from the country, after having been manufactured here. Subsidies have been granted and paid to ocean-going mail steamers, and untold millions to our manufacturers under the operation of our protective-tariff policy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss here and at this time the policy of such legislation, but simply to show how much Government has done to promote these great industries and how little it has done to advance and develop the greater industry of agriculture. In all the years of our history Congress has appropriated less than five millions of dollars in aid of agriculture, the mother of commerce and manufactures. This industry received no recognition at the hands of Congress prior to the year 1839. Then it was started as a division of the Patent Office, with an annual appropriation of $1,000, for the purpose of collecting and distributing seeds, making investigations, gathering statistics, &c. Down to the year 1854 the annual appropriations had not reached $6,000 in any one year, yet a foundation had been laid and much good done.

During the administration of President Buchanan this industry was further recognized by the appointment by the Secretary of the Interior of a special superintendent of agriculture; and in 1862 the division of agriculture was made a separate Department, with its powers and duties greatly enlarged. This enlargement of its powers and elevation of the rank of its head were due to the fact that the feeding of the Union armies then in the field had become of paramount importance to the country. It was at that time, also, that, in order to encourage and stimulate the production of supplies for this army, the land donations were made to the States for the purpose of endowing industrial universities.

This, Mr. Chairman, in short, is about all that Congress has ever done in aid of the great farming interests of our people. This is very small in view of the magnitude of the industry and in view of the additional fact that it has done so much to make us as a people and as a nation prosperous and independent at home and respected and renowned abroad. Ours has now become the foremost agricultural country of the world, leading all others in the aggregate yield of corn and wheat and cotton and hogs and tobacco, and is far ahead of all others in most of the remaining products of the soil. Chicago now outstrips Odessa, on the Black Sea, once the largest grain-distributing port of the world. New Orleans exceeds all other cities in the value of her cotton trade, and Louisville as a tobacco market. In order that our country may maintain her primacy in this regard and continue to contribute as she does at present more than 80 per cent. of all commodities transported by river and rail, Congress must become more liberal in appropriations for the highest development of this industry.

What have other countries done in aid of agriculture and in order to relieve them from dependence for the farm products of their great rival, the United States?

France expends annually (I give only round numbers) for agriculture and commerce	$20,000,000
Brazil, for agriculture	12,000,000
Russia, for agriculture	11,000,000
Austria, for agriculture	5,500,000
Hungary, for agriculture	4,000,000
Italy, for agriculture	1,914,000
Japan, for agriculture	1,000,000
Great Britain, for agriculture	795,000
Switzerland, for agriculture	142,000
United States, for agriculture	650,000

Of all these countries named, the little Republic of Switzerland alone does less to promote agriculture than the great Government of the United States. Thus, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen how little this Government has done for its greatest industry in comparison with what other governments have done.

Great Britain has been our best market, and the largest consumer of our cotton and wheat, and has taken largely of our meats and other farm products. And she has been unceasing in her efforts, and almost reckless in expenditure, to achieve independence of us as regards her supply of these products. She has explored the civilized world and expended millions in search of countries possessing a soil and climate suitable for the production especially of cotton and wheat. She has subjugated countries, at least one of them, possessing a population five times that of her own, chiefly that she might not remain dependent upon other countries, and more especially upon the United States, for these necessities.

The highest reach of statesmanship has been directed to the development and building up of the agricultural industries in her colonial dependencies, in order that she might there produce the raw material of her manufactures and the breadstuffs for her people. For nearly a half century she has used the best talent at her command experimenting in the production of cotton in India, nor has she hesitated to make any necessary expenditure for expert labor or scientific knowledge in prosecuting investigation to accomplish this end. And her far-seeing statesmen believed that this end was about to be attained when the war between the States had partially cut off the world's supply of cotton. The price of this article had become so high that the unfavorable conditions of climate and seasons for its production in India had been well nigh overcome and its growth and production improved and lagerly increased. But the war ended; the crop of our country in a few years reached its former quantity and assumed its normal position in the markets of the world. India rapidly fell far behind us and soon ceased to hold an important position as a cotton-producing country.

British silver (for that is the coin of India) has gone to India to build railways for the transportation of wheat and other farm products to the seaboard, and these railways traverse the broad valleys of the Indus and the Ganges, that stretch away in fertile plains to the foot-hills of the interior, affording largely increased facilities for transportation. The mountain streams of the country have been tapped by irrigating canals that take the water through the almost rainless regions to the lower valleys, fertilizing the growing crops for hundreds of miles along their way. Through the use of this British silver the production of wheat has been so stimulated and increased that the export to England has reached the large quantity of 40,000,000 of bushels, thereby virtually driving that quantity of our wheat from the British markets. The consequence was a great depression and stagnation of the wheat and flour industries of this country, forcing wheat down to a lower price during the summer of 1884 (and it is but little better now) than it had reached for a century.

While England was making these great efforts to build up and develop he agricultural resources of her East India dependencies, so as to make her independent of our wheat and cotton fields, other causes were operating to deprive us of our next best customers—Germany and France. Each of these nations has become somewhat imbittered against us in consequence of the heavy duties imposed upon their manufactured products imported into this country, and has retaliated by orders and decrees injuriously affecting the introduction of our hog and beef products into their ports. These highly protective duties, while largely increasing the cost of all manufactured articles consumed by the farmers, whether of domestic or foreign manufacture, has the tendency to shut them out from their best foreign markets.

Now, the farmer asks no special privileges, nor does he desire to put burdens upon any class or industry, and he accepts uncomplainingly all the burdens of Government equitably placed upon him, but he does protest against a system of legislation that is destroying his best foreign markets. He expects and demands that some regard shall be had to the principle of reciprocity in legislation affecting his freedom of access to foreign markets. Give to him friendly markets in Europe and other countries for his cereals, provisions, cotton, tobacco, and other products, and he cares but little for any protection against foreign competition; he can then compete successfully with the world.

Congress at last seems disposed to take a broader and more liberal view of this subject than it has heretofore done. And I may be permitted to express the hope that this body will by its legislation elevate the farming industries of this country to a higher plane. What is most needed to accomplish this desideratum is for Congress to do four things. First, to make the Department of Agriculture one in fact as well as in name, and give to its secretary the rank, powers, and privileges of a Cabinet minister. The head of the Department then, having a voice in the treaty-making power, will be better able to protect the farming interests than they have at times been, especially in regard to reciprocity treaties affecting the imports and exports of the farm products.

Next, let Congress pass a bill making annual appropriations to support agricultural experiment stations in connection with the industrial universities created and endowed under the act of 1862. These universities will then become the source whence will emanate the results of scientific research and experimentation. Soils will be analyzed, the physiology of animals and plants will be more fully made known, and the observing and inquiring farmer may become more familiar with the elements of plant food and the chemical constituents of his soils. He will learn more of the germinating qualities of seed and the effect of special fertilizers on various crops. Science will be called into requisition to supplement the productive powers of our rapidly exhausting fields and meadows. Give to the farmer in addition the full benefits of the "Signal Service system" and he will be on the high road to a grand success.

Let these stations be established at all county seats and other important agricultural centers where there may be a telegraph line, so that he may be warned by the flag of the approach of every rain and frost and snow, so that he will be enabled to put his household in order and thereby save thousands of dollars of value to the country. This done, the farmer may the better regulate his planting and harvesting and save much in the way of hay and other farm products from rains, and tobacco and fruits and stocks from destruction by frosts and snow. Notably, the orange crop of Florida might, under such a system, have been saved to the owners during the recent extraordinary blizzard, and hundreds of young stock cared for and saved from perishing by the cold and snow. Also, pass the bill in relation to consular reports, as I have indicated in the beginning of my remarks, and the farmer will feel that his interests have been well-considered.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to these aids to agriculture, farmers, more than any other class, need a stable monetary system and an abundant circulating medium. Relatively, they want cheap money and dear products. A want of sufficient circulation or any sudden contraction or depreciation affects this class most seriously and injuriously. They are sparsely scattered over the rural districts, have the least facilities for intercommunication, and are the last to be warned of danger in an approaching monetary crisis. They can not be so compactly organized as to bring the influence of their numbers and wealth to bear upon legislation in their interest, and are to a great extent at the mercy of the great trades and professions of the country. The latter have their lobbies constantly at this capital and the seats of government in the States to watch and arrest, if possible, all unfriendly legislation to their interests and to encourage such as will promote their schemes, whether for honest purposes or illegitimate plunder. They have their chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and syndicates, and to a large extent these great corporations, for most of them are incorporated, control the capital and subsidize the talent of the country, while the yeomanry and mechanics are considered as the legitimate prey of their avarice and plunder.

And all of this howl about dishonest silver is but a well-concocted plan on the part of the capitalist and the monopolist to make money dearer and labor and commodities cheaper. In other words, it is a contest between creditor and debtor; the one asks the Government to strike down one-half the metal money of the Constitution, and the other, the debtor class, pleads that it may not be done to their ruin. The debtor asks the privilege of paying his debts in the money of the contract, and the creditor demands that half the metal currency of the contract be destroyed that the other half may be doubled in value, thereby increasing almost to that extent the purchasing power of the payment he shall receive from the debtor. Let the debtors be allowed to discharge their debts in the currency of the contract, and this certainly can not wrong any one. Unfortunately for the laboring classes of our country the currency is too much controlled by a class who have the least sympathy for the wealth-producers—I mean the capitalist, the banker, the bondholder, and the interest-receiver.

Go inquire of the men who cultivate your farms, dig your canals, and build your railroads and manufacture your implements and machinery what currency they prefer, and in nine cases out of ten they will inform you the silver dollar. If I desired to know the best currency for the laboring man, I had rather have the opinion of the hod-carrier and the ditch-digger than that of the Vanderbilts and the Goulds.

But it is asserted that gold is less subject to fluctuations in value than silver. The facts will not sustain this assumption. Professor Jenons, an Englishman of high authority in such matters, tells us that from 1800 to 1849 (after the discovery of the California mines), a period of only forty years, gold appreciated in value 145 per cent., while the price of silver was not greatly depreciated after the discovery of the silver mines of Mexico and Peru.

Gold was undoubtedly the first metal produced by man. It is always found in a natural state, that is to say, but slightly mixed with other metals, and rarely in mixed ores. It is therefore easy to detect. It is equally easy to mine; the placer gold is washed in a gourd or bowl, and quartz gold is pulverized in a hand-mortar and washed in a bowl.

In its early history it was used for ornaments, in the arts, and manufactures, and not as money. There is no well-authenticated account of its use as money before the days of Julius Cæsar, forty-six years before Christ. The surface finds of gold in India, China, and Japan were so great up to a thousand years ago that whole pillars of gold upheld the ornaments of the temples in those countries. The Chinese refuse to use it as money because it is generally found upon the surface without labor. Greece for centuries coined nothing but silver, because of the abundance and cheapness of gold. India and China knew that if these pillars were melted down and coined into money the money would rapidly depreciate, and hence refused to recognize it as money. But the supplies of gold are being rapidly exhausted and new mines are not being discovered to any great extent.—Delmar.

Among the exhausted countries are all of Asia except Siberia, all Europe, the coasts of Africa, and the whole of America except the Pacific coast of the United States, and some neglected spots in the interior of South America. It is in these few regions, chiefly Siberia, California, Australia, and the interior of Africa, that any considerable quantity of "pay gold" in placers is left. The combined mineral products of these countries now amounts to less than 4,000,000 ounces, or $64,000,000. Add to this the entire yield of this country for the year 1885, say $30,800,000, and we have the sum total of the world's yield, making an aggregate of $94,800,000. The ancient mines of the Golden Tagus, and of Phygia, and of Thrace, and of the Greeks and Romans, and of Bohemia, and Britain of the Middle Ages have all been exhausted and ceased to be worked. In view of these facts and the additional fact that the greater portion of the world's yield at present is being worked up in the arts and manufactures, we might well have to inquire, where will the future supplies for coinage come from?

It is alleged that gold is less liable to fluctuations in its value than silver. This is not entirely true, and so far as it is true, is due to the fact that government in many countries has fixed the price of gold and has not of silver. In 1816, under the premiership of Lord Liverpool, silver was demonetized in England, and from that period on has only been a subsidiary coin. England has no silver mines, and is not particularly interested in fostering the silver-mining industry, and made the change from bimetallism to gold monometallism because her statesmen believed it to be to her interest, and without asking the consent or concert of action of any other nation.

In 1838 Baron Humboldt pointed to Russia from whence in the near future supplies of gold in large quantities would be forthcoming. It alarmed England with its gold standard. His predictions were soon after verified. In 1840 the yearly output from the Russian gold mines included 18,744 pounds avoirdupois of gold, and the yield increased yearly till in 1843 the amount was 40,953 pounds avoirdupois, more than doubling its output as compared with 1840. Much uneasiness was then manifested in England at this sudden turn in the production of gold. It was proposed in Parliament to increase the quantity of metal in the sovereign in order to bring its value up, as it has been done here to increase the quantity of silver in our dollar to bring its relative value up to the gold standard.

But Sir Robert Peel proposed a remedy, and it was to give gold a fictitious value by fixing its price and compelling the Bank of England to pay that price for every ounce of gold bullion offered. This was done and the price fixed at £3 17*s.* and 9*d.* per ounce of standard gold. Thus a fictitious value was put upon gold by act of Parliament in 1844, and so continues to this day. And the operation of our coinage laws has the same effect, practically fixing the price of gold bullion at the Mint at $20.67 per ounce, while silver is left to the fluctuations of the market. Put silver on a footing with gold at your Mint, and it will gradually rise and approach a parity with gold. Germany in 1880 fixed the price that should be paid by the imperial bank of that empire for all the gold bullion offered. Thus has this country, too, legislated to hold up the value of gold and to prevent its fluctuations.

Before these countries fixed the price by law gold was liable to fluctuations in value as silver was. I give a table (Moran, page 173) to show the prices:

Average market price of standard gold per ounce.

	£	s.	d.		£	s.	d.
1809	4	10	9	1814	5	1	8
1810	4	5	0	1815	4	12	9
1811	4	17	1	1816	4	0	0
1812	5	1	4	1816 (October to December)	3	18	6
1812 (from September to December 12)	5	8	0	1817	4	0	0
1813	5	6	2	1818	4	1	5
1813 (November to March)	5	10	0	1819 (to February)	4	3	0
				1820	3	17	10½

It will be seen from the above table that the fluctuations in gold have been frequent and considerable, even after the single gold standard had been established.

It will thus be seen how frequent and how great were the fluctuations in the price of bullion prior to the enactment by Parliament to fix the price. And thus it would be now were these enactments by England and Germany repealed. Let us as a silver-producing country do justice to our own industries, make coinage free and unrestricted as to all American silver, and silver will gradually come up to a parity with gold, and the whole country will be benefited and there will be no disturbance to trade and commerce. The masses, the toilers, want the silver; it has been their money for more than four thousand years, and they cling to it as an ancient heir-loom.

Since Abraham purchased the field and cave of Machpelah from Ephron for "400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant," down all the ages silver has been used as one of the money metals of the world. History informs us that it was in use in China twenty-two hundred years before the Christian era. The silver mines of Lurium in Greece were among the earliest great mines worked; they have long since been exhausted. Silver is rarely found in its native state, but in combination with other ores; hence, to demonetize silver and discourage and depress the silver mining business would lose to our country a considerable proportion of the lead and copper, as well as gold, that is found commingled with the silver ores in nearly all of our silver mines. The great Comstock lode, that has so frightened the gold-bugs has yielded as high as 41 per cent. of gold. So, Mr. Chairman, silver mining is more of a legitimate industry than gold mining, as the former yields a large percentage of other useful metals.

The relative value of gold and silver at different times has been in ancient Greece and Rome and in modern countries as follows:

In ancient Greece and Rome, 1 to 12; in Greece, after the conquest of Alexander the Great, 1 to 10; in Italy, after the conquest of Julius Cæsar, 1 to 9; after the conquest of Sicily by the Romans, where large quantities of silver were found, 1 to 17; at the end of the fifteenth century, in Europe, 1 to 11; in England, in 1604, 1 to 12½; in France, in 1641, 1 to 13½; in England, in 1666, 1 to 14½; in England, in 1717, 1 to 15½; in Holland, in the middle of the eighteenth century, 1 to 14½; in France, at the same time, 1 to 15.

The production of gold from 1800 to 1848 was equal to 59 per cent. of the total stock in 1800 without affecting in any way that can be discovered the relative value of gold.—Delmar.

During our colonial period each Colony had its own monetary system, and there was very little uniformity in the value of their coin circulation, which was chiefly made up of the Spanish milled dollar, the pistareen, and bit, and the pound, shilling, and pence; and these were valued differently in the different Colonies. As early as 1785 Thomas Jefferson and Robert Morris the financier, as he was called, feeling a great want of a uniform standard in our circulating medium, discussed the matter, and finally agreed upon 15½ to 1, that being the ratio between the two metals in Great Britain; in Spain 1 to 16, and in France 1 to 15—these being the countries with which we had the largest trade. The first silver dollar coined in 1794 contained 371¼ grains of pure silver, and every one coined since contains precisely the same quantity. How, then, can it be a dishonest or clipped dollar?

Our silver dollar has since its first coinage really been the standard of value in this country, always remaining the same, while the quantity of pure metal in the gold dollar has been changed three times. The change in the ratio of the two metals, by putting more metal in the silver dollar, would simply remove us farther from all other bimetallic countries, as we already have more pure silver in our silver dollar than any other country in Europe or Asia. France and the Latin Union maintain silver at 15½ to 1 to gold at par with the latter. To demonetize silver would greatly depress the cotton industry of the country in this way: Manchester, England, works up more by double of our raw cotton than any other manufacturing center in the world, and the great bulk of the fabrics turned out by her mills find a market in India and are paid for in silver.

Now, any good business man can readily see that if you diminish the value by legislation of the coin in which the Manchester manufacturer is paid for his products, you compel him to pay a less price for the raw material or bankruptcy will be his ultimate end. We can also pay in silver coin for all articles imported that we can not produce here, as they come from silver-circulating countries, say our tea and coffee, as each of them chiefly comes from single-standard silver countries. And our manufacturers would certainly not complain if we forbear to go to England or Germany, where they do not want our silver, to purchase their manufactured articles that come in competition with our own manufactured products.

Mr. Chairman, Germany had maintained the single silver standard for more than twenty years. When she began to coin gold in 1871, and ultimately made gold the single standard in 1873, and Bismarck began the work of reducing the silver coin to bullion for export, the price declined so rapidly that he was compelled to desist, and much of the old silver coin yet remains in the possession of the government. The masses there have never been satisfied with the demonetization of silver, and are quite clamorous at times for its restoration, and not only the masses, but many learned men and leading financiers, both there and in England, favor the restoration of the silver coin to the circulation.

But, Mr. Chairman, why should we go to England and Germany to get our monetary system? Are we not able to establish and maintain one of our own, independent of all other countries? We have a greater territorial area than any of them, a larger aggregated wealth than any country on the globe; our products of the soil exceed those of any and of all countries; and in all the elements and essentials that enter into the makeup of a virtuous, a thrifty, and a great nation, we are unsurpassed by any in the tide of time. I say, then, it is humiliating to confess that we are incapable of formulating and maintaining a monetary system of our own, based upon the wisdom and experience of centuries and our own true and substantial interests. And why go to the monarchical governments of Europe for an example? Let us rather look to the freer Governments of Greece and Belgium and of Holland, and to the Republics of France and Switzerland.

Why should we go to the land of the imperial chancellor of despotic William to get our models in finance, where women are still yoked with the ox and the dog to drag the plow along the furrow and the cart along the road; where the countryless Pole is driven from his home and the graves of his ancestors, simply because he will not speak the German language and adopt the German customs? Or why should we look to England, where seven hundred landlords own nearly one-half the lands in the kingdom, and where absentee landlordism has despoiled the fairest isle of the ocean and driven its inhabitants to desperation; that island which has sent its orators to every English-speaking country, and has given to the world more than its share of poetry and of song, and "whose sons have fought successfully all battles save their own."

Let us pause, Mr. Chairman, before we commit this great wrong of demonetization to the debtor classes, thereby invoking the state of affairs that exists in Europe, where the creditor is the master and the debtor is the slave.

SILVER QUESTION.

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, under the rules which obtain here I am accorded a voice, but no vote. I feel all the solicitude for the result of your deliberations which can possibly attach to them upon this question, and regret that I can not in some more substantial way share the responsibility of your ultimate action. I speak for a people whose lives, energies, and fortunes have been hazarded in the development of the mineral resources of this country; a people who are the bone and sinew of a Territory whose valleys of gold and mountains of silver have never ceased to swell the volume of the precious metals of the world for a quarter of a century; a Territory which, if measured by the grandeur of its mountains, the fertility of its valleys, the majesty of its rivers, the splendor and utility of its waterfalls, the richness of its mines, the number and value of its herds and flocks, the wealth of its forests, the health and vigor of its climate, and the intelligence, aspirations, and patriotism of its citizens, will soon be permitted to take a place in the grand galaxy of American States, the youngest but the fairest of them all, when representation here will no longer be an empty honor and a delusion, but a full fruition of that sacred and inestimable right. I can not reasonably hope to add anything of value to a discussion that has taken such wide range and been elaborated upon by so many students of the subject both in and out of Congress; nor would I venture to claim the attention of the House upon so important a measure if it were not for the interest felt in it by my constituency.

The recent utterances of the Executive in his message to Congress relating to the suspension of silver coinage, in which he has taken such a decided stand against the continued coinage of the silver dollar, has invested the subject with a dignity and importance which otherwise it would not possess. His position is plain and unambiguous and needs no construction. It is an open declaration of hostility to silver as money, and as such awakened the liveliest interest in this country. No question affecting the administration of government has elicited such careful and considerate attention and investigation. But, happily for the country, as I believe, it has resulted in dispelling whatever of fear and alarm the words of the Executive may have created. The highest order of statesmanship and intelligence asserts and demands that this question shall be considered in the relation that it sustains to the whole country.

Yielding none of the many objections which have been so forcibly urged against a suspension of silver coinage, my inclination leads me to consider briefly two prominent questions involved in it.

First. Has Congress the power to suspend silver coinage under the Constitution?

Second. If it has, does our position among the nations of the earth, considered with reference to our comparative silver productions and commercial position, justify us in pursuing such a course?

Upon the first proposition I am in full accord with the reasoning and conclusion of the minority report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Referring to the act demonetizing silver, the minority report says:

> This act was clearly an infraction of the true theory of bimetallism, and in conflict with the Constitution. It assumes that Congress should exercise the power of controlling the volume of money by prohibiting the coinage of one of the monetary metals recognized in the Constitution. If, under the Constitution, Congress has the power to prohibit or limit the coinage of silver, so it has that of gold.
> To admit that it can demonetize one of the metals is to admit that it can demonetize both; therefore, the gold monometallists, who are so swift in their denunciations of the Supreme Court for holding that Congress has the power to issue paper legal tenders, should consider the result of their own theory of monetary science. For, if Congress has the power to demonetize the metals, it must necessarily result in exercising the authority claimed by the decision of the Supreme Court—that is, in printing legal tenders and forcing them into circulation.
> As a constitutional question, it is here claimed that Congress has no lawful right to demonetize either gold or silver; but it is the plain duty to provide for the coinage of both at some regulated value or ratio. The Constitution says "the Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Again, "No State shall * * * make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Upon the second proposition I submit that there are three incontestable facts which forbid the pursuit of a policy which will result in the demonetization of silver.

First. Out of the world's product of silver we are now producing about one-half. In 1884 the world's product was $115,147,878; out of this sum the United States produced $48,800,000.

Second. According to a report of Mr. Williams upon the mineral resources of the United States, a work prepared under the direction and supervision of the Bureau of Geological Survey, millions of dollars have been and still are invested in the production of this metal in the United States. He says:

> While, therefore, it is impossible to reach even an approximate estimate as to the actual investment in silver mines, we know it to be a large amount, perhaps $300,000,000, perhaps $500,000,000, possibly more, but certainly in excess of $100,000,000.

Upon this industry alone he estimates that 520,000 people are dependent for support.

Third. Seventy-five millions' worth of gold and thirty-five millions' worth of silver, according to the report of the Director of the Mint, are annually consumed in ornamentation, manufacture, and the arts. The same authority is responsible for the statement that the production of gold for the preceding year was $95,292,369 and that of silver was $115,147,878. In fact, some authorities, considered to be quite as reliable, estimate the amount of gold used in the arts to be equal to the annual production of that metal, leaving us no margin out of which to supply a necessary circulation consequent upon the increase of population and commercial interests of the country. What is there traditionally or historically in the use of silver as money which justifies its subjection to this proposed indignity? It contains the same amount of silver it did in 1792 when it was made the unit of value. It has never changed.

Gold and silver are made money by our Constitution. They have been and always will be so treated the world over as long as civilization endures.

To the citizen and the stranger at home and abroad neither has failed to perform its important office, thus vindicating and confirming the judgment of mankind in the employment of these two metals as the money of the world. The following table serves to show the amount of gold and silver in the world to 1885, and furnishes us a reliable basis upon which to estimate the degree of usefulness which silver has attained among the nations of the earth.

Countries.	Gold coin and bullion.	Silver coin and bullion.	Total.
United States	$626,422,646	$269,665,758	$896,088,404
Great Britain and Ireland	583,500,000	95,000,000	678,500,000
India		1,037,000,000	1,037,000,000
France	848,000,000	595,000,000	1,443,000,000
Belgium	64,000,000	60,000,000	124,000,000
Switzerland	17,000,000	15,000,000	32,000,000
Italy	140,000,000	72,000,000	212,000,000
Greece	2,700,000	2,700,000	5,400,000
Spain	130,000,000	70,000,000	200,000,000
Portugal	30,000,000	10,000,000	40,000,000
Germany	325,000,000	211,000,000	536,000,000
Austria	45,000,000	75,000,000	120,000,000
Sweden	15,000,000	5,000,000	20,000,000
Denmark	14,000,000	5,000,000	19,000,000
Netherlands	28,000,000	57,000,000	85,000,000
Russia	124,000,000		124,000,000
Turkey	40,000,000	35,000,000	75,000,000
Roumania	163,000	11,000,000	11,163,000
Total	3,032,785,646	2,625,365,758	5,658,151,404

To be more exact and taking the last estimates of the statisticians and bringing them down to this year, by adding the output of the mines to that date, the amount of money in the world of the two metals now is respectively as follows:

Gold	$3,513,000,000
Silver	3,750,000,000

This gives about 48 per cent. of gold and 52 per cent. of silver as the world's ratio.

Since their first discovery there never has been any great disparity in the output of the two metals. Sometimes the annual production of the one exceeded the other, but ultimately about the same proportion is found in both. This fact is not altogether strange; they are bound together in their native or primitive state by an indissoluble tie. No instance is of record where one was discovered without the other was present. In some degree they are chemically combined, wherever found, and this is suggestive of an important fact in the consideration of this question.

I assert it to be true that one-fourth of the gross value of our silver ores is gold chemically combined with silver, and one-fourth is copper chemically combined with silver, and that the cost and expenses of extracting either would not justify its mining and production where this condition exists, if it were not for the value of the other. This is a factor that seems to have escaped the attention of the monometallists in their attempt to establish a gold standard. What is the certain and inevitable result? While the gold monometallists are tightening their grasp upon their gold by destroying silver they are strangling and eliminating 25 per cent. of the production of their favorite metal, which they propose to make the yardstick of commerce, thereby adding 25 per cent. more to the purchasing power of hoarded gold. But these are not the only elements which go to enhance the value of gold. As shown by the report of the Director of the Mint, nearly the entire annual production of gold goes into the arts and manufactures, thus increasing the purchasing power of coined gold.

Later on we will see who has the gold of this country and whose fortunes will be multiplied while millions of the debtor class groan and toil and sweat under the contraction which must follow, if unhappily they ever succeed in their unholy purpose.

Our legislation on this subject ought to be in perfect accord with the Constitution. That instrument mentions only gold and silver as real money. It does not discrimate against either. A fair and honest administration and enforcement of existing laws would long since have gone far to demonstrate the perfect equality of value between gold and silver as a circulating medium. There is a community of interests among the people in upholding silver against the control and manipulation of those who would destroy it. Their words are but the echoes of those who stand behind and direct a crusade, the success of which would be as destructive as the fatal touch of the upas. These observations find support in the fact that this is undeniable.

A SILVER, WHEAT, AND COTTON PRODUCING COUNTRY.

Demonetize silver, or what is equivalent, suspend its coinage, and even under existing law our currency is contracted $24,000,000 annually and the price of silver would fall 25 per cent. The price of cotton and wheat would make the same decline, because the price obtained for the surplus fixes the value of the whole crop, and the price of the surplus sold in foreign markets would be reduced by the competition of the wheat and cotton raised in the Orient purchased with silver which the British bankers and merchants have obtained at a discount of 25 per cent. from the miners of the United States, because the suspension of its coinage decreases the demand. Let us pause for a moment and inquire who have originated and conceived this proposed annihilation of silver.

It can find no well-grounded support in those whose aims and aspirations are to promote the public welfare; no voice of encouragement is heard from the great grain or cotton producing sections of the country. No representative or champion of labor or of the toiling millions rises in this forum to join in the cold-blooded legislative assassination of this twin sister of gold. From whence, then, comes this alarm? Is it not patent that the capitalists of Great Britain and their allies in America have been instrumental in directing this attack upon silver-producing countries with the view of reducing the cost of our great staples of production? In other words, the less the price of silver the less the cost of wheat and cotton raised in India and Africa for British consumption, and which would be taken in exchange for our silver purchased at a depreciated price.

It has been fairly estimated that the debt-paying power, or in other words the purchasing power of wheat, cotton, and silver bullion, would be reduced fully $100,000,000 if suspension of silver coinage should ensue, and, as before stated, if Great Britain can enforce a policy that will reduce the price of silver in the United States, whose mines produced last year over $50,000,000, she will be enabled to transport it to the Orient and purchase their wheat and cotton from those silver-consuming nations that much less, which would necessarily procure a lower level of prices for those staples in this country. This is too plain for argument. The monometallists, however, meet us with the proposition to submit this question to the adjustment of an international congress, wherein we should agree to use the double standard upon a fixed ratio. This would be a delightful panacea if it was only accomplished. It is doubtful whether such a result will ever be reached. Indeed, it is maintained by eminent authority that such a theory is based upon a misconception of the causes that contribute to make the two metals the world's money.

Mr. Hill, who has given this subject great attention, has said lately in an address delivered at Providence that—

> This doctrine seems to have been originally the invention of an Italian, M. Cernuschi, now a banker in Paris, who made a special visit to this country in 1877 for the purpose—in which he completely failed—of persuading Congress that it would be an act of what he called "audacity" on its part to authorize the resumption of silver coinage without first arranging the terms of an accord with the European powers upon the monetary question. This doctrine is certainly not more than a dozen years old, and appears novel to an extraordinary degree when it is remembered that both gold and silver have been regarded and treated as moneys of the world from time immemorial, and have satisfactorily performed the office without a single example in history of the international regulation of the subject. The Latin Union, formed in 1865, is not an example of such a regulation, as it is sometimes supposed to be. All the countries composing it were contiguous and acting upon the double standard, and at the common ratio of 15½ to 1, before they entered into the union. The whole object of the union was to facilitate the interchangeable use of their respective coins.
> The doctrine of Cernuschi is not only repugnant to the experience and practice of the world for thousands of years, but it is based upon an entire misconception of both the nature and the causes of the fact that the two precious metals, sometimes called the "noble metals," are the world's moneys. When Daniel Webster said, fifty years ago, that gold and silver were money in this country by the law of the land and money abroad by the law of the world, he neither meant that there was any such impossible thing as legislation for the world, or that there were international treaties upon the subject, which although not an impossible thing, had not been proposed or even thought of. He meant merely that confidence in the value and steadiness of those metals had always existed and was so universal that they were everywhere an accepted medium of exchange, and enjoyed what Edmund Burke called an "everlasting credit."

In 1792, when the fathers of the Republic established free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver and made the silver dollar the unit of value, no compact with other nations was deemed expedient or essential. For eighty-one years the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver was sanctioned by law. It is true that the same incentive did not exist then as now for this new expedient. At that time we had no debt to speak of. Now our bonded debts are fabulous, and the few who hold them purpose to shape and direct legislation so as to double the price of their property.

I can not reconcile the theory of these gentlemen who insist upon the suspension of silver coinage with the fact I mentioned in the outset that we are a silver-producing country and furnish about 45 per cent. of all the silver that is produced in the world. It would be easier of comprehension if the situation was reversed and we were the purchasers instead of the producers. If such were the condition, there might be some plausibility in it. It needs no demonstration to prove that a destruction of one of the standards of values will increase the value of the other. In other words, that if the coinage of silver is suspended the currency of the country would contract to that extent and in the same proportion the value of gold would be increased.

In addition to this increased value add to the value of the coined gold 25 per cent., made manifest and certain by stopping the production of silver chemically combined with gold, and I undertake to say that you have increased the purchasing power of gold nearly 50 per cent.; and this leads us to a very pertinent inquiry: Where is the gold of this country, and who would be directly benefited by such legislation? There are $562,000,000 in gold coin in the United States, and of this sum it is estimated that national banks own $250,000,000; and so we see the patriotic national bankers, assembled in Chicago in September last, volunteering the following resolution:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the convention that the coinage of the silver dollars under the compulsory law of 1878 is detrimental to the best interests of the people and dangerous to the welfare of the Government; and that the law should be immediately suspended and remain inoperative until an international agreement of the leading commercial nations shall give substantial assurance as to the future relation of gold and silver as money.

To such a source are the American people invited to turn for disinterested advice upon which to base and formulate the financial policy of this country. No advocate of the present law or of unlimited coinage asks any advantage to silver over gold; but they insist that nothing less than an equal chance to attain that perfect equality against which there is no constitutional inhibition will ever meet with the indorsement or approval of the people.

Among the things demanded here and now is, that if no new legislation is enacted the present law shall be enforced, relating to the payment of the public debt; and that instead of suffering the silver of this country to be piled up in the Treasury, and thereby virtually withdrawn from circulation, it shall be applied to the payment and extinguishment of the interest and principal, certainly in the proportion which the silver coinage sustains to the gold coinage of the country. The law is so plain that "he who runs may read" on the back of every bond that it may be lawfully paid in either gold or silver. It has been said that the law is a jealous mistress, and this is justly true. It may be hard in a particular case, but it is founded on public policy and can not be made to yield to expediency or the circumstances of any given case. It ought to be administered alike to the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak.

A principle once surrendered in a particular case is no longer firm, but trembles at every new attack. If any innovation is to be made upon a plain and positive law for the sake of our institutions do not permit it to be done by any authority less than Congress.

> Stop innovation in its early stage,
> For when the upstart thing grows strong from age,
> No time nor strength of tenets stop its rage.

Who then can successfully sustain the executive department of the Government, of this and the preceding administration, in refusing to utilize the silver on hand and available for that purpose? It would be strange, indeed, if silver did not lose some of its dignity and usefulness as a circulating medium when thus compelled to submit to such discriminating treatment. Since 1878 it has been continually handicapped in the race with gold. What explanation can be made of such a course? Is it not a clear attempt to do indirectly what Congress has refused to do directly, namely, to suspend the coinage of silver, for such is virtually the result?

Let the laws be enforced; let the Executive foster and encourage the production of silver until our silver coinage shall at least amount per capita to that of other countries which purchase our silver and which are to-day noted among the prosperous nations of the world; and then, indeed, will it be time enough to decry and discourage an industry upon which so much depends and destroy a circulating medium which, since time began up to this glad day, has never failed faithfully to subserve its purpose.

It has been seriously argued that a continued coinage of silver would result in flooding us with foreign silver and the expulsion of our gold.

If there was anything in this proposition why does it not follow, by the same parity of reasoning, that our country is the dumping-ground for foreign wheat and cotton? One is as impossible as the other, for the reason that we produce more than we consume, as will appear from the following table, the correctness of which is vouched for by the Director of the Mint.

Imports and exports of coin and bullion in the United States.

Fiscal years.	Imports of gold coin and bullion.	Exports of gold coin and bullion.	Imports of silver coin and bullion.	Exports of silver coin and bullion.
1878	$12,976,281	$9,204,455	$16,490,599	$24,535,670

It requires a strange philosophy to generate a fear of such a result when it is known that Europe has no supply of silver except its coinages, in which the silver is rated about 3 per cent. higher than it is in our standard dollar, and more than 20 per cent. higher than could be obtained for it in our markets. Our circulation of paper or silver does not approach an equality in volume with other commercial countries, and until it is above and beyond a proper proportion of such our prices can never be inflated above the prices abroad, so as to cause a balance of trade against us.

If we would give stability, dignity, and value to our silver production commensurate with the importance of that industry to the United States without impairing the quantity or intrinsic value of gold, it is essential that a new departure shall be taken by the Executive and Treasury officials. Instead of a policy which seems to be an organized system of assault and consequent depreciation, the opportunity should be seized upon to follow a plain direction that has the sanction and validity of law to support it—one which since 1878 has been trampled under foot and defied with a boldness and determination that brings back the memories of other days when nullification in another form threatened this country.

When reports of our Treasury officials, made in pursuance of law, are published to the world they are clothed with a verity and authenticity which are well calculated to inspire confidence in the public of the absolute truthfulness of their purport.

And so it is that a sentiment has been molded in certain quarters based solely upon such reports that the aggregated silver of the country can find no circulation, and hence its lodgment in the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States; and that a further coinage is folly and extravagance. Such a statement is illusory and misleading. It is incontestibly true that there are $10 in silver coin to one in gold coin in actual circulation among the people, and that three-fourths of the silver dollars now in the Treasury are represented by silver certificates in actual circulation in the business of the country.

AMOUNT OF MONEY REQUIRED IN THIS COUNTRY.

We have now of gold and silver	$923,000,000
United States notes	346,000,000
National-bank notes	318,000,000
Fractional currency, about	7,000,000
Total money for 60,000,000 people	1,594,000,000

or $26 per capita. This is none too much. As the population and business increase we shall need more, not less. France, a much more compact country than ours, and the soundest country in the world financially, and a republic, has in addition to its $900,000,000 of gold and $600,000,000 of silver between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 of paper, making a total of $2,000,000,000. This is $52 per capita of her population, or twice as much as we have. She does not find that too large a sum. We should not if we had it.

We certainly, then, have not too much money now; and to avoid disaster we must take care that its volume is not reduced.

For these figures and estimates I am indebted to Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York, a gentleman of much learning upon this subject.

These considerations are enough to admonish us that we have not reached within fifteen years of the time when, at the present rate of coinage, the question of suspension can be seriously considered. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] was disposed to complain in his recent speech because the Government was compelled to furnish a market under existing law for $2,000,000 of silver per month, and characterized it as a form of protection which no other commodity received in this country.

Some practical individual once defined law to be: "That which is confidently asserted and plausibly maintained." The correctness of the gentleman's statement can not be measured by any stronger rule. If this was protection it would seem that silver ought to thrive and prosper under the protecting ægis of the Government. But everybody knows that the contrary is true, and that every time it contracts and shrinks it can be traced to the dissembling and illusory touch of the Government.

Why, sir, instead of silver being a burden and accepting the so-called protection of the Government, it has been loaded down with a weight of seigniorage until it has become an actual investment for the country, out of which the Government has made a net profit of $25,122,184.90 since July 1, 1879, for its coinage. As proof of this statement I submit the following from the last report of the Director of the Mint, pages 8 and 9:

SEIGNIORAGE ON SILVER COINAGE.

Arising from seigniorage on silver coinage, there were in the coinage mints at the close of the fiscal year moneys amounting to $1,177,444.70, known as the silver-profit fund, which had not been deposited in the Treasury.

The seigniorage on the coinage of silver dollars during the fiscal year was $4,355,278.84, and on subsidiary silver coined at Philadelphia $10,197.61; a total for the year of $4,365,476.45. Of this amount, the sum of $67,554.71 was paid for expenses incurred in the distribution of the coin ($63,064.25 being paid the express companies, and $4,354.56 for bags, bagging, &c., and $135.90 for telegraphing).

The sum of $20,879.38 from the same fund was used to reimburse the loss arising from the silver wastage of the operative departments, and the loss on the sale of silver in sweeps during the year, corresponding to the deficiency between their assay value and the amount realized from their sale.

The sum of $5,329,120.99 was covered into the Treasury of the United States, leaving a balance at the coinage mints on June 30, 1885, of $725,366.07.

The distribution of this balance at the close of the fiscal year among the coinage mints was as follows:

Philadelphia	$230,823 17
San Francisco	25,587 22
Carson City	31,045 56
New Orleans	437,910 12
Total	725,366 07

The above statement as approved by this bureau was verified by actual count by representatives from the Department. Of the above balance, the portion at Philadelphia and at New Orleans has since been covered into the Treasury. The amount at Carson and San Francisco has been retained in order to meet the expense of distributing the stock of silver dollars now stored at those mints.

As shown by preceding reports of the Director of the Mint, as well as by the accounts of the coinage mints on file in the office of the Register of the Treasury, the seigniorage on silver on hand at the coinage mints on 1st of July, 1878—the beginning of the fiscal year following the passage of the "act authorizing the coinage of the standard silver dollar," amounted to $424,725.47. The seigniorage since that date up to June 30, 1885, on the coinage of silver has amounted to $225,328,389.97. Adding the sum of $9,237.54, refunded by Adams Express Company for overcharges, and $4,560.30 surplus bullion and adjustment of silver values carried to the credit of the "silver profit fund," makes a total of silver profits to be accounted for of $25,776,913.28. Of this amount $483,778.23 has been paid as provided by law for expenses connected with the distribution of these coins exclusively, and $170,950.15 used to reimburse wastages and lawsuits on the sale of sweeps incurred in connection with the coinage of the silver dollar. The net profits for the seven years, including the balance in the mints on July 1, 1878, thus aggregates $25,122,184.90. Of this amount $24,396,818.83 was covered into the Treasury of the United States prior to the close of the last fiscal year, and the balance, $725,366.07, was in the coinage mints at the latter date. Of this latter amount $668,733.29, being the balance, as stated above, at the mints at Philadelphia and at New Orleans, has been deposited in the Treasury.

From the above it will be seen that this is protection with a vengeance. If the same kind of protection was accorded to gold, the gold monometallist would characterize it as that protection which the wolf gives to the lamb and the eagle to the dove.

When Russia, Australia, and California were pouring their unprecedented supply into the lap of the world, $900,000,000 in six years, political economists became alarmed, and its demonetization was advised by some. A few nations yielded to the prevalent sophistry of the time and saw safety only in refuge behind silver. Among those who were conspicuously wiser and braver, was France with her bimetallic system. Suppose the coinage of gold had been suspended at that time. Silver would have been king, and gold, excluded from the mints, would for a time have only been a merchantable commodity with only a small demand. The situation now is only reversed. At that time $900,000,000 in gold was dumped upon the country in six years—a production without parallel in all the past. Instead of rejecting it, our legislation stamped it as money and saved it from depreciation. It is no better than its twin-sister, silver, which under similar governmental influence and protection will soon assert and maintain its parity with gold.

It must be apparent to every observer that as our national-bank notes, based upon Government bonds, are steadily disappearing in order to prevent a contraction of $40,000,000 a year, their place must be supplied by some equivalent. How are we to keep up the supply of good money? This question is intelligently answered by Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins, a gentleman from New York, who appeared before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a short time ago. He says:

With the payment of our debt the national-bank notes, based upon Government bonds, are steadily disappearing. Their place must be supplied by coin or its equivalent; otherwise a contraction of about forty millions a year will follow, and a consequent depression of business and absorption of property by capitalists.

The output of our mines will easily furnish the mints the silver to do this; and it costs the people nothing to buy and pay for this silver, because it may be done in silver coin or coin certificates. In this way, in a few years, our three hundred and eighteen millions of paper money, based on nothing but a promise, and a promise, too, that within twenty-five years last past has been at one time worth only 40 cents silver to the dollar, will become three hundred and eighteen millions of silver dollars, whose weight has never varied in the ninety-four years of their existence, or certificates for coin held in trust by the Government to redeem these certificates at the pleasure of the holder.

The domestic trade of the country, estimated at $25,000,000,000 per year, is now done, and from the habits of our people always will be done, chiefly with paper representing money. These certificates, representing coin in the Treasury, are the best kind of paper money ever devised by man.

So long as the Government buys the silver at the market price and coins it into standard dollars, these dollars within this country necessarily under the present law will have the same purchasing power and paying power that the gold dollar has.

It is the duty of Congress to provide for and secure the business and prosperity of this country and not of foreign countries, and to take care of the $25,000,000,000 of home trade.

Our foreign trade, both imports and exports, is only about 15 per cent. of our domestic trade. Our exports for the last twelve years have paid for our imports and left an average credit balance in our favor of more than $100,000,000 per year. Unless the business of the country is disturbed by legislation in the interest, not of ourselves, but of foreign countries, this credit balance will continue. But if it is disturbed, and a debit balance is produced, this debt will have to be paid to the gold-using countries with gold and to the silver countries with silver; hence the necessity of keeping both in quantities so large that a draft upon either need not disturb our financial position. The coining of our whole available product of both silver and gold will enable us to do this.

The theory that the possession of a large amount of full legal-tender silver is going to make it more difficult, as the gold monometallists say, for us to pay abroad an adverse balance of trade has no foundation in fact. It is pure fiction. Logically it is like assuming that a large corn crop disables us from exporting wheat when there is foreign demand for wheat; or that large wheat crops hinder the export of corn whenever other nations require that cereal. The truth is, the more we have of either the greater is the amount we can pay out or export of the other without inconvenience. If we had only gold, as desired by the enemies of silver coinage, and that departed to pay debts to gold-using nations, we should have no coin left as a basis of our paper money, and that would vary as heretofore from par to 60 per cent. discount, but if we hold both, the temporary departure of one will only bring the other for the time being more into use, and will support our paper and keep our industries alive.

In my judgment this is not an expedient, but a satisfactory and certain solution of this question.

I refrain from descending further into details, that have already been presented to the House and the country; but, in conclusion, I insist that the time is at hand when, in order to meet the demands of increased population, resources, and inviting future, our silver coinage should be free and unlimited.

When we shall have given each of the metals the same opportunity to work out its own salvation, our attention should then be directed to the establishment and maintenance of commercial relations with the silver-consuming nations, where our silver will find a more appreciative and remunerative recognition than in Western Europe. Such an opening awaits us. It involves no destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the production of silver, nor the consequent pauperizing of 550,000 people necessarily dependent on that industry—a condition of things which must inevitably follow as a part of the calamity of the suspension of silver coinage.

On the other hand, it is in perfect accord with an honorable national ambition to outstrip all competitors in the race for national greatness; it encourages the development and exploration of our great mineral resources and holds out a reward to labor and capital alike; it lifts the banner of patriotism high above the mere whim and caprice of the money-changer; it forbids that which the Constitution would not sanction—a discrimination against either of the precious metals; it is the capstone upon our monument of financial supremacy, in which every citizen ought to feel an honest and just pride. [Applause.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, the message and policy of the President of the United States which has been brought so prominently forward in this discussion marks an epoch in the history of our great country. After twenty-five years of exile the Democratic party has returned to the confidence of the people, and is now seated in the high places of the Government. Such a change as this, so radical in its character, excited for a time the apprehensions of some of the wisest and the best men of the country.

Republicans have imputed wild and absurd theories to the Democratic party. On one hand it was claimed that that party would wreck the Government financially; that it would destroy the value of securities; that it would disturb all the centers of trade, and convert the prevailing prosperity into a scene of universal distress. But in a year's administration of the affairs of the Government by that party its opponents are confounded, and the good people of the country have become thoroughly satisfied with the wisdom, ability, and conservative character of that administration. There has been much said, as naturally there would be in the clamor for office, of a disparaging character; but to-day the great sentiment of the people is that Mr. Cleveland's administration has been marked with vigor, dignity, ability, and an honest determination on his part to discharge the high trust confided to him to the best of his ability, and that he is working for the people and in their interest alone.

In its commendations the press of the country has not been silent, but here in this House, where the Democratic party largely preponderates, there has not been as yet a single voice raised to speak this public sentiment approving of the purposes and conduct of the administration. Therefore it is that my humble voice is raised; therefore it is that I venture so early to say a few words in defense and vindication of that policy which will shortly place the Democratic party, not on an ephemeral basis, but on an enduring one, a basis which will constitute Mr. Cleveland the first of a long line of Democratic Presidents.

The administration, I repeat, has been a vigorous one. It has met all foreign complications in a manner that recalls the vigorous days of Madison and Monroe. Our dignity was preserved in the dispute with the Argentine Republic; our marines were quickly dispatched to restore order at the Isthmus, and the prisoners of English cruelty who appealed to this Government for protection had it accorded to them, though it was unavailing to save them from the fate which had befallen them.

The foreign service has been much improved by the gentlemen of honor and of character who have been sent abroad to represent the Government. My own State feels particularly honored that three of her most prominent citizens have been sent, one to France, one to Austria, and the other to Prussia. At home every department of the Government has been carried on without any disturbance or interruption. Business has been transacted in a satisfactory manner, and the public has entire confidence in the financial policy so strongly marked by Mr. Cleveland.

In his message the President lays down the true democratic doctrine with reference to finance, and states in the gravest manner the importance of this Congress doing something toward relieving the people from an overissue of silver money. It is not necessary for me to follow him in his views upon this subject, as letters and other documents issued by him since his inauguration have discussed the question fully, fairly, and in all its details. He attributes the present dearth of business to this overissue. He appeals to Congress in the strongest manner to relieve the people; and, Mr. Chairman, if we would only be as prompt in the discharge of our duty as the President has been in discharging his, we will not spend any more hours and days of this session in an idle discussion of a subject upon which every gentleman here has already fully made up his mind.

I have been told by distinguished gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol that this overissue of silver is necessary for the poor and laboring man. I do not believe it. Did I think so my vote should certainly be cast with the distinguished Senators from Kentucky and North Carolina. To me the voice of labor is never silent. I hear always the cry of the overworked and oppressed and down-trodden workingman of this country. I am anxious to extend to him and to his every help that lies in my power. In every act of my official life my first thought is "how will this affect the interests of those who toil for their living and who are so much oppressed by reason of the unholy legislation of the last quarter of a century in the interests of the great monopolies of the land." Did I believe it was for the interest of the laboring man that the silver coinage should be conducted in this unlimited way I certainly would pause and gravely consider what my course should be upon this subject. On the contrary, I honestly think that it is the workingman who pays the penalty of all bad legislation, of all bad laws. It is upon him that the burden of taxation falls. It is upon him and those near to him that hard times press with the greatest severity. And I think to-day that the greatest question before us or that can come before us in this great parliament is this "wage" question. [Applause.]

It is claimed by the friends of silver that cheap money measures will always benefit the workingman. Mr. J. H. Walker has prepared a table to establish the contrary fact, and I wish my friends to note it carefully. In making this table Mr. Walker has not been extravagant in his figures. He has taken only the necessities of a bare existence per family of four, and the figures are too low in my opinion. He has taken for normal prices those of 1860.

The purchasing value of the wages paid in any given year is found by multiplying the wages paid that year by the cost of the necessaries of life at the normal prices of the year 1860, namely, $225, and dividing the product by what the same things actually cost him in the year he received the wages used in the calculation. The wages of a dyer in 1860 was 67 cents a day; total cost of food and supplies, $225. His wages in 1864 were $1 per day; total cost of the same food and supplies, $441.67; i. e., $1 multiplied by $225 is $225, which divided by $441.67 gives 50 cents, which was the purchasing value of his $1 of 1864. Their real wages in 1864 were one-quarter less than in 1860. It was four years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860, namely, in 1865, when their wages were $1.20, and would buy what 68 cents would buy in 1860. During this time their real wages averaged 53.9 cents a day, and they lost the value of 189½ days' wages, $126.90. To-day they, those happily employed, are receiving one-third more than in 1860, $1 in a gold currency which will buy as much as the same normal sum would in 1860. Many, very many, are clamoring for work, and I know of no greater misfortune that could befall a country than not to be able to furnish work to its able-bodied men who need and demand it.

Plain weavers, who were paid 72 cents in 1860 and $1.08 in 1864, could only buy with their $1.08 in 1864 what they could buy with 55 cents in 1860.

Their real wages, therefore, in 1864 were one-quarter less than in 1860. With the exception of one year, it was eighteen years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860.

During that time their real wages averaged 58¾ cents, and they lost the value of 597½ days' wages, $430—fully two years.

To-day their wages are 85 cents, one-sixth more than in 1860. In leather manufacturing, yard hands, who were paid $1 in 1860 and $1.66⅔ in 1864, could only buy with their $1.66⅔ in 1864 what they could buy with 85 cents in 1860. Their real wages, therefore, in 1864 were 15 per cent. less than in 1860. It was five years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860.

During that time their real wages averaged 90½ cents, and they lost the value of 114 days' wages, $114. To-day their wages are $1.67, two-thirds more than in 1860.

Green shavers, whiteners, and skivers who were paid $1.75 in 1860 and $2.50 in 1864, could only buy with their $2.50 in 1864 what they could buy with $1.27½ in 1860. Therefore their real wages in 1864 were more than one-quarter less than in 1860. It was eight years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860.

During that time their real wages averaged $1.40⅞, and they lost the value of 416½ days' wages, $729—nearly a year and a half. To-day their wages are $2.90, nearly two-thirds more than in 1860.

Carpenters who were paid the same as the green shavers, &c., in 1860 and 1864, with the same results for those years, got their wages back sooner.

In six years, carpenters' wages were worth to them as much as in 1860.

During that time their real wages were $1.45½, and they lost the value of 260 days' wages, $455—nearly seven-eighths of a year. To-day the wages are $1.75, the same as in 1860.

Machinists, who were paid $2 in 1860 and $2.50 in 1864, could only buy with their $2.50 in 1864 what they could buy with $1.27½ in 1860. Their real wages, therefore, were in 1864 nearly three-eighths less than in 1860. It was eight years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860. During that time their real wages averaged $1.61⅛, and they lost the value of 405½ days' wages, $810.60—over one year and a third.

To-day their wages are $2.25, one-eighth more than in 1860.

Locomotive engineers, who were paid $2.40 in 1860 and $2.80 in 1864, could only buy with their $2.80 in 1864 what they could buy with $1.42⅝ in 1860. Therefore their real wages in 1864 were more than two-fifths less than in 1860. It was ten years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860. During that time their real wages averaged $1.91½ a day, and they lost the value of 545½ days' wages, $1,309.50—nearly one year and seven-eighths.

To-day their wages are $3.20, one-third more than in 1860.

Locomotive firemen, who were paid $1.20 in 1860 and $1.50 in 1864, could only buy with their $1.50 in 1864 what they could buy with 76⅘ cents in 1860.

Their real wages, therefore, in 1864, were nearly three-eighths less than in 1860.

It was eight years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860. During that time their real wages averaged 93⅘ cents; and they lost the value of 468 days' wages, $561.75—more than one year and a half.

I find that the average day's wages lost to each operative in nineteen leading industries is 331.3 days, or about one year and one-tenth.

Taking the country over, and reckoning five persons to a family, it gives ten million families. Assuming that the earnings of each family are $220 a year of three hundred days, shows that the loss to the wage-workers of the country by the depreciation of the currency was $2,750,000,000, a sum equal to the public debt on August 31, 1865, its highest point, and nearly double the present national debt. This experience of the American wage-worker is precisely that of his brother in France during inflation times, excepting not so severe. There thousands of artisans and their families actually died of starvation. Their wages, while nominally high, would not buy enough to sustain life.

The history of England shows the same state of things during the clipping and debasing of her coin, and also in the times of her inflated paper currency. And the same is true of every country that has tried such experiments.

We find laws framed by Republican legislators enabling men to pile up colossal fortunes in the East, while at the same time the wages of the laborer becomes day by day less and less. I remember the day in the city of Baltimore, which I have the honor in part to represent in this House, when the American mechanic was the most independent man in the world. He had his happy home, his hearthstone ablaze, and his larder plentifully filled, his children cared for and educated—peace, happiness, and prosperity were his. But now, toil as he will, work as he may, it is impossible for him to provide the necessaries of life for those who are dependent upon him for support. It seems almost as if there were a conspiracy between those who employ labor to reduce the wages of the workingman in this country to the very lowest possible limit.

Was it not a great Republican orator who said corn-meal diet was sufficient for any workingman? Was it not another great Republican orator who said he did not see why a workingman of America required those luxuries of which the workingman in Europe never dreamed? Has not the Republican party all the way through its history thrown the weight of its influence and its power in behalf of the privileged and money classes and against those who are earning their living by the sweat of their brows? Under the Democratic administration of Mr. Cleveland we may hope to see all this changed; for from his utterances on this subject it is evident he understands that the views, purposes, and aims of the Democratic party are the protection of those who need protection, and opposition irreconcilable and everlasting to monopoly in every shape and form.

"Not on swords and spears
Is the reliance of the coming years;
Not by the cannon's throat shall truth proclaim,
Her mighty mission—not with blood and flame
Inscribe her lessons in the book of Time;
Her strongest weapons shall be words sublime;
Her armies, thoughts; her banners, printed sheets;
Her captains, voices crying in the streets,
The earth is good, and bountiful and fair;
Her choicest blessings are the destined share
Of all her children, who in love combine
Wisely to labor."

On the subject of Chinese labor, which is so exasperating to the "bread-winner" at this time, the President expresses his entire willingness to give earnest consideration to further remedial measures to prevent the influx of elements hostile to our internal peace or security.

There is another topic of the greatest public importance treated of in the message, and that is the question of the defenseless condition of our seaboard. We are at peace, and long may we remain so; but the experience of history teaches us that in time of peace we should be prepared for war. Certainly a system of coast defenses should be adopted at once, and proper appropriations made for carrying it out. Our Navy has almost disappeared from the seas. It will take a long time to construct another. I am glad to say, however, that owing to the excellent machinery in the Washington navy-yard we are manufacturing the very latest and most improved arms. Indeed, there is very little work of any importance with reference to the construction of a new navy which could not be done in that yard and in my own city of Baltimore, where there are thousands of skilled laborers anxious and desirous to do the work. The fame of the Baltimore ship-builder is world-wide, and for beauty and for speed the Baltimore clipper has ever remained unrivaled on the seas.

In the details of the course pursued by the Navy Department in reference to the bad practices which had under Republican administration squandered so many millions of the public money, it will be seen that the Department acted on strict business principles, and that in the controversy between the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Roach the Secretary preserved the rights of the people. I regret very much that the two additional cruisers and the two gunboats authorized by the Forty-eighth Congress have not been built as yet. The President very satisfactorily explains the reason for the apparent delay—the importance of obtaining proper plans for the construction of these vessels. There is no doubt that he appreciates the importance of a proper navy, and that under his administration that branch of the public service will be restored in such manner as will fix our standing among the nations of the earth. The President informs us that during seventeen years past $75,000,000 have been spent by the Republican party upon the Navy, no traces of which can be found, and he tells us, too, that it is our duty to build up a navy that will compare favorably with those of other countries.

In regard to the Post-Office Department the President states a fact well known to all of us, that a proper attention has been given to the prevention of waste and extravagance, and that good results appear from the report of the Postmaster-General. The President has given much attention to the Indian question, and his recommendation on that subject should be most carefully considered. A large portion of his message is devoted to the consideration of the grave results likely to follow from the establishment of landlordism on the public domain. This has been a great curse to Ireland, and should be avoided by every effort. He also speaks of the subsidies to some of the great railroads of the West. I must confess that I would have preferred to see him still more severe in his denunciation of these two great evils, because the land is the property of the people, and not one acre should be devoted to any railroad or any other corporation whatever.

It is evident that the President does regard "public office as a public trust," and in dealing with the vexed question he is animated by the very highest purposes. His desire is to secure to the people good, wise, and economical government.

When you have read the message and are familiar with its details, it would seem at this time to be a work of supererogation to discuss it; but it is time that we should here, in this great body, speak of it. A Democratic President has in the clearest manner defined his policies; it is equally our duty, as Democratic Representatives, to do the same, to hold up his hands, to stand by him and support him in order that we may reap the full and substantial results of the victory of last year. The good, the wise, the conservative, and honorable administration of public affairs, such as will be given the country for the next three years by Mr. Cleveland will, if we be equally true to our trust, secure for us and our great party a long, prosperous, and victorious career. [Applause.]

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, the important and interesting question of the power of the General Government to levy and collect direct taxes is presented by the consideration of House bill No. 3, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the report of that committee, and the views of the minority. That bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other person charged with or concerned in the payment of any sum of money from the United States to any State of the Union, to withhold the same from such State, or its duly authorized agent, by reason of any claim that such State is bound for any part of the war tax levied by the act of August 5, 1861, or any act amendatory thereof, or to treat the said tax in any way as a set-off against any claim in favor of any State.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws, and all rulings or decisions of any Department of the Government or of any officer thereof, inconsistent with the foregoing section, be, and are hereby, repealed and annulled.

I shall not attempt to discuss the important legal questions involved, for that branch of the subject properly belongs to the constitutional lawyers of the House, who, of course, differ upon the material points, but I propose to consider the matter practically—and especially with reference to the State of Virginia, which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor.

The Constitution, article 1, section 8, says:

Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes.

Prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, July 28, 1868, it was clear to my mind that under article 1, section 2, the power to levy direct taxes among the States was vested in the General Government, for the Constitution then said:

Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union.

The General Government did exercise that power by the act of August 5, 1861, and the acts amendatory thereof, and a direct tax of $20,000,000 was laid and apportioned among the States and Territories according to population.

Mr. Chairman, it is admitted that over $17,000,000 of this amount has been paid, and that the balance stands charged upon the books of the Treasury against fourteen States or the people thereof, over $2,000,000 of this unpaid balance being against the following States: Alabama, $520,821.87; Georgia, $512,959.58; Mississippi, $338,342.10; North Carolina, $190,000.22; Tennessee, $281,775.94; Texas, $225,098.61; Virginia, $213,561.30.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Charles J. Folger, in a letter of March 9, 1884, addressed to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, certified that of this $20,000,000 direct tax there was imposed upon the State of Georgia $584,367.33, and upon the State of Virginia $937,550.67.

By the joint resolution of Congress, February 25, 1867, $208,479.65 of the amount originally imposed upon Virginia was transferred to West Virginia, leaving $729,071.02 for old Virginia. It further appears that of this direct tax Virginia, or her citizens, paid to the United States $515,569.72, and that Georgia, or her citizens, paid only $71,407.75. There remains due from Georgia $512,959.58, while Virginia's account shows a balance due of $213,501.30.

By the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury was required to pay the State of Georgia $35,555.42 for supplies for the troops in 1817, under the command of General Jackson, engaged in local defense. This $35,555.42 allowed by the said act of Congress has not been paid, because under the ruling of the First Comptroller of the Treasury Department it has been placed to the credit of the State of Georgia on the books of the Treasury against the said balance of $512,939.58, which appears due by the State on account of said direct tax. Now, Mr. Chairman, our ablest lawyers differ upon the question whether or not this balance of $512,939.58 is a debt due by Georgia to the United States, but the fact is that the Government treats it as a debt and holds it as a set-off against the claim of the State.

We are not asked, Mr. Chairman, to pass directly upon the merits of Georgia's case and her claim, which in itself, I think, is equitable and just; but the bill proposes indirectly to relieve Georgia under the cover of other States, and thus the question concerning the direct tax paid by Virginia and other States is presented for the consideration of the House. The bill (H. R. 3) proposes to relieve all the States from the payment of any part of the war tax levied by the act of August 5, 1861, or any act amendatory thereof now due, and to render it unlawful to treat said tax in any way as a set-off against any claim in favor of any State.

I am not, as a Representative from Virginia, opposed to this measure of release, but I do not believe I should support it when another, a better, a more just and proper mode of relief for Virginia and all the other States of the Union is presented, as is evident by the substitute to the bill presented in the minority report.

In the consideration of this matter the fact should not be overlooked that all the States assumed the payment of this direct tax, except Delaware and the then Territory of Colorado and the eleven States engaged on the side of the confederate cause during the late civil war; and as to the State of Virginia and other insurrectionary States by the act of Congress June 7, 1862, the said tax was made a lien upon the land; and as is well known the Supreme Court has decided that the title to land sold under said lien is good and valid.

I am for relieving Georgia, and think she should be paid the $35,552.42, but not at the proposed cost, expense, and loss to Virginia and the other States of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I favor the substitute to the bill because it will, if adopted, refund to Virginia $515,569.72, to Georgia $71,407.75, and to all the States the full amount of direct tax paid by or collected from them. I fully agree with the minority, because they "favor the restoration of all the States to the status occupied before the imposition of the tax by the remission of all that part of the $20,000,000 not paid to the States delinquent, and the return of all sums of money paid to the States making the payment."

The adoption of the substitute would release Georgia, Virginia, and all the States absolutely, and, as I have before said, Virginia thereby would have refunded $515,569.75, the amount paid by her or her citizens.

I desire to add the substitute to my remarks. It is as follows:

Strike out from House bill No. 3 all after the enacting clause and insert the following words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to state an account with each of the States and Territories of the United States as they existed on the 5th day of August, 1861, and with the District of Columbia, and in said statement of account he shall place to the credit of each State, Territory, and District all moneys paid by either of them into the Treasury of the United States, or all moneys that were collected by the agents of the United States, from either of them or from their citizens, as direct taxes levied upon the United States, and apportioned among the several States, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendments thereto; and he shall also place to the credit of each State, Territory, and District such sums of money as were earned by any such States, Territories, or District, by reason of collections of said direct taxes made by them and paid into the Treasury of the United States; and said Secretary is directed to pay to each of said States, Territories, or District the sums under said accountings found to be due, and credited to them, respectively; and the said Secretary is further directed to write opposite to any charges of debit that now stand on the books of the Treasury of the United States against any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, by reason of the direct tax above mentioned, the words 'remitted in full,' and the said unpaid portion of said direct tax is hereby remitted in full to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, and they are each hereby released from all obligation to pay any of the unpaid portions of said tax."

Mr. WILLIS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WILLIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had been in session for debate only under the order of the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARKSDALE: Papers relating to the claims of Henderson W. Hendricks, of Nancy Lewis, of Stephen W. Osborne, of Mary D. Ambrogia, of Wilson F. Dillon, and of George W. Farr, of Hinds County; of Mabella A. Stampley and of Matilda E. Chambliss, of Jefferson County; and of Alexander C. Cordill, of Warren County, Mississippi—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BOUTELLE: Petition of citizens of Harrington and of Machias, Me., in behalf of a law to permit the masters and mates of sailing vessels to be licensed as pilots—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE: Papers in the claim of J. W. Roberts, of Henry County, Kentucky—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 41 citizens of Boston, Wayne County, Indiana, for free coinage of silver—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, petition of 77 citizens of Henry County, Indiana, for a service pension for the soldiers and sailors of the Union Army in the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURROWS: Petition asking a pension for George Otis—to the same committee.

By Mr. CANNON: Memorial of the Knights of Labor, No. 3710, of Danville, Ill., favoring the Hennepin Canal—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, memorial of the same, for the organization of a Territorial government for Indian Territory, &c.—to the Committee on Territories.

Also, memorial of James K. P. Weaver, of Arthur, Ill., for removal of the charge of desertion—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. W. H. COLE: Petition of the savings-banks of New York, asking for the repeal of the law directing the coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollar—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. EVERHART: Petition of savings-banks of New York State, praying for the discontinuance of the coinage of the silver standard dollar—to the same committee.

By Mr. GROSVENOR: Petition of citizens of Pomeroy, Meigs County, Ohio, for an appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River at that point—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition for the relief of Margaret Green—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GROUT: Memorial of Daniel W. Morehouse, asking pensions to those confined in rebel prisons—to the same committee.

By Mr. HALL: Petition of many citizens of Washington County, Iowa, for the passage of the Oklahoma bill—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. HAISELL: Petition of John W. Belt and 202 others, citizens living on Green River, Kentucky, for the purchase from the Green and Barren River Navigation Company the remainder of their lease—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, papers to accompany bill for the benefit of John Burnam, of Kentucky—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. J. H. JONES: Petition of citizens of Upshur County, Texas, for an appropriation sufficient to secure deep water at Galveston, Tex.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of citizens of Ben Wheeler, Van Zant County, Texas, for the same purpose—to the same committee.

By Mr. MILLER: Petition of citizens of Colorado County, Texas, for the improvement of the harbor of Galveston—to the same committee.

Also, petition and protest of citizens of Columbus, Tex., and of Colorado County, Texas, against the passage of a general bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NELSON: Petition of C. U. Taylor and others, for additional pension legislation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'DONNELL: Petition of 81 voters of Brookfield Township, Eaton County, Michigan, for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the same committee.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of J. T. Godfrey and others, citizens of Rice County, Kentucky, opposing the passage of a bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PETTIBONE: Petition of Gustavus Gerette, late postmaster at Midway, Tenn.—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, petition of George Smith, late postmaster at Whitesburg, Tenn.—to the same committee.

By Mr. RANNEY: Petition of George H. Peters and others, relating to pilots, &c.—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petition of Brooklyn Savings Bank and some 40 other savings-banks, relating to coinage of silver—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. SENEY: Joint resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio, requesting legislation for certain documents to pass through the mails at pound rates—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SESSIONS: Petition of citizens of Allegany, N. Y., in favor of opening Oklahoma Territory—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. STAHLNECKER: Petition of savings-banks of New York State, for the repeal of the law directing the coinage of the standard silver dollar—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. TAULBEE: Memorial of mass-meeting of citizens held in the city of Mount Sterling, Ky., in relation to survey of Licking River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of Samuel Stunburg, for relief, to accompany bill—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WARD: Petition of the Knights of Labor of Clinton and Tipton Counties, Indiana, praying that the Chinese immigration into this country be prohibited by law—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. A. J. WEAVER: Petition of G. R. Martin and 34 others, and of P. Van Fleet and 12 others, of Table Rock, Nebraska, for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving to women the right of suffrage—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chadron, Nebr., asking that Fort Robinson, Nebraska, be maintained—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MILO WHITE: Petition of citizens of Austin, Minn., for restoring wages in the Printing Department and against Chinese immigration—to the Committee on Labor.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, the Indian and colored schools, supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. ROMEIS: Of Rev. William W. Williams, Henry Hathaway, D. D., and 18 other clergymen, 10 physicians, 1 lawyer, 29 teachers, 67 prominent business men, and 55 officers of temperance and other societies, of Lucas and Ottawa Counties, Ohio.

By Mr. WAIT: Of Rev. H. D. Robinson, James Robert Fuller, D. D., and 16 other clergymen, 4 physicians, 7 lawyers, 15 teachers, 122 business men, and 27 officers of temperance and other societies.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 8, 1886.

Prayer by Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., of Saint Louis, Mo.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, requesting a transfer of a portion of the appropriation for gas for the Post-Office Department to the appropriation for gas for the building occupied by the money-order office and the Sixth Auditor's Office; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the communication may not be printed, as it is probable that we shall consider the appropriation bill to-morrow morning, and the print might not reach us in time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without being printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all honorable means within their power to secure appropriate legislation by which "annual catalogues of institutions of learning and annual reports of all missionary, educational, and benevolent institutions and associations shall be placed on the list of matter to be sent through the mails at pound rates."

That the governor of the State of Ohio be, and he hereby is, requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this resolution.

DANIEL J. RYAN,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ROBT. P. KENNEDY,
President of the Senate.

Adopted, February 23, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the bill giving the International Navigation Company of Philadelphia the privilege to buy foreign-built ships; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring an appropriation for a new light-house tender for use on the Delaware Bay and River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Henry J. Joy, John B. Redman, and other citizens of Ellsworth, Me., praying for legislation protecting American merchant vessels from undue exaction for pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of representatives of savings-banks of the State of New York, remonstrating against the coinage of the standard silver dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Nathaniel A. Hawes, late a private in the Thirty-first Maine Regiment, praying for certain legislation granting him additional pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present resolutions adopted by Knights of Labor of Fort Madison, Iowa, favoring liberal appropriations from the surplus revenue for the construction of works of internal improvement of national importance and a distribution among the people in the form of wages of the funds hoarded in the vaults of the Treasury that have been taken from the people by taxation on what they eat and what they wear; also in favor of the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of the Bangor (Iowa) quarterly meeting of Friends, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) providing for the creation of an international peace arbitration commission; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Hon. J. A. T. Hull, president of the senate of the State of Iowa, Hon. Albert Head, speaker of the house of representatives of that State, and 25 members of the two houses, State officers, &c., and a petition of Wadsworth Post No. 36, Grand Army of the Republic, of Dexter, Iowa, and 75 other citizens of Iowa, praying the Senate to pass House bill 3921, for the relief of Richard Gear; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of the mayor and aldermen of the city of Manitowoc, Wis., and ship-owners and merchants of the cities of Manitowoc and Milwaukee, Wis., and Chicago, Ill., praying that a breakwater be built at the mouth of the river at Manitowoc, Wis., outside the piers now being constructed, such a breakwater being required for the purpose of protecting the shipping in the river from damage by the force of waves entering from the lake; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Lodge 3585 of the Knights of Labor at Eau Claire, Wis., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Lydia C. Wheeler and 32 other ladies, of Dartford, Wis., praying for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the disfranchisement of any citizens on the ground of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Ida E. Ryder and 21 others, residents of Fall City, Wis., praying for the passage of a law requiring that all imitations of butter and cheese shall be stamped as such; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of Lewis Tillman and 67 others, citizens of Knoxville, Tenn., praying that the Constitution of the United States be so amended as to guarantee the right of suffrage to the women of the United States. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a letter addressed to myself, but evidently in the nature of a memorial to Congress, remonstrating against the passage of a bill increasing the postage on fourth-class mail matter. There are three such papers from different parts of Tennessee, one from Johnson City, Tenn., signed by J. C. Campbell, another from Rockwood, Tenn., signed by John M. Pilon, and another from Staunton, Tenn., signed by A. W. Martin. They are stereotyped, and evidently intended as memorials to Congress. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Nashville, Urbana, and Bloomington, Ill., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of R. C. Sherwin and 57 other citizens of Peru, Ill., praying that the coinage of silver be placed on an equality with the coinage of gold, and for the enactment of other financial measures in the interest of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Cheboygan, a petition of Knights of Labor of Ludington, a petition of Knights of Labor of Harrison, and a petition of Knights of Labor of Fremont, Mich., praying for the relief of the laboring classes by liberal appropriations for public works, and especially for a harbor of refuge at Ludington, Mich., a work of great national importance; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Clinton County (Mich.) Wool-Growers' Association, remonstrating against the reduction of the duty on foreign wool; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Gurden L. Wight and 10 other ex-Union soldiers, praying for the passage of Senate bill 927, for the relief of survivors of the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of Springfield, Mass., praying for the passage of the bill relating to the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workingmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of Local Assembly 3798 of the Knights of Labor, also of Local Assembly 1045, the first of the town of Hiawatha, State of Kansas, and the other of Scranton, in that State, favoring among other things the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I wish to say that these petitions are evidently prepared at some central place and sent out for this purpose. They all bear the same print, and all are very elegantly printed; and it is to me a little suggestive that there must be some pretty strong private interest behind the Hennepin Canal, or the petitions would not obtain such a wide distribution. While I say that, I have the utmost respect for the assemblies who send these petitions here.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to know on what ground the Senator suggests that it is done through private interests. The Hennepin Canal is a great public interest. The whole country is interested in its construction.

Mr. PLUMB. Did the Senator himself have the petitions printed?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; he did not.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I take great pleasure in presenting petitions of the Knights of Labor of Albany, Ill., Monmouth, Ill., and Nashville, Ill., and quite a number of other places, in favor of the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I take it for granted that the petitioners are in favor of the Hennepin Canal, first, for the reason that it is a great public enterprise and would be a public benefit, and, second, because it might be an advantage to them in furnishing labor. I presume that had something to do with it. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of ex-soldiers of Jasper, Ohio, praying for the passage of a bill carrying out the provisions asked for by the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Illinois will undoubtedly also take great pleasure in learning that the Knights of Labor of Augusta, Me., Lodge No. 4872, are very desirous, as shown by their petition, that the Hennepin Canal shall be built; and also the Knights of Labor of the city of Portland, Me., Lodge No. 2050, whose petition in favor of the Hennepin Canal I also present; and both petitions are in favor of expenditures of money for public improvements. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN. They want cheap food, and that is the way they will get it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented resolutions adopted by the Vessel-owners and Captains' Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of a new light-house tender for the fourth light-house district for the use of Delaware Bay and River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of the establishment of a nautical school at that port; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present the petition of the Knights of Labor of Lincoln, in the State of Nebraska, setting forth among other things that the condition of hopeless destitution and relentless poverty in the State of Illinois is so great, as shown by the bureau of statistics of that State, that it is necessary that the National Government should come to the relief of the destitute in that State by the building of works of great public importance, among them the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I present resolutions of the Board of Trade of Helena, Mont., favoring the passage of a bill requiring the coinage of gold and silver upon equal terms. The last resolution requires Hon. J. K. TOOLE, the Delegate from that Territory, to present the resolution to both Houses. As he can not present them here, he has sent a copy to me to be presented to the Senate. I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I present a memorial said to be signed by 600 citizens of the Pan-Handle of Idaho, remonstrating against the annexation of that part of the Territory of Idaho to Washington Territory, and asking, I believe, for its annexation to the Territory of Montana. This subject has been reported upon in connection with the bill for the admission of Washington as a State, but there is a separate House bill providing simply for the annexation of that portion of Idaho to Washington Territory pending before the Committee on Territories of the Senate. That being the case, in order that the memorial may be considered by that committee, I move its reference to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I present a resolution adopted by the Fair Play Assembly of Knights of Labor, of Goshen, Ind., not formally addressed to the Senate, but evidently intended for its consideration, in relation to Chinese immigration and other bills pending in Congress affecting the laboring classes. I ask that the paper be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of the Bridgeport monthly meeting of Friends, Marion County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of Pomona Grange, of Watertown, N. Y., praying for a reduction of the rate of postage on fourth-class matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the faculty of the Georgia College of Eclectic Medicine and Surgery, remonstrating against an increase of postage on fourth-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Westernport, Md., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the Glen Elder monthly meeting of Friends of the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to create a tribunal for international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Belfast, Me., praying for the passage of the bill introduced by Senator MITCHELL, of Oregon, prohibiting the immigration of Chinese into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a memorial of Ralph S. Demarest, on behalf of himself and his brother Garret Z. Demarest, of Demarest, Bergen County, New Jersey, as innocent purchasers of certificates of award for $13,500, in the year 1877, in reliance upon the treaty of April 25, 1866, the so-called "finality act" of 1873, &c., remonstrating against the ratification of any new convention with Venezuela for opening the Caracas awards until provision is made by the Government of the United States for indemnifying the petitioner and all other such purchasers; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of the bill authorizing a railroad bridge over the Kill von Kull; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of New Jersey, favoring the abolition of the office of President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Plainfield, N. J., praying for the better legal protection of young girls in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Bartonville, Ill., praying that the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory be opened to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of R. F. Johnson and 99 others, citizens of Olathe, Johnson County, Kansas, praying Congress to pass the bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, favoring an appropriation for the enlargement of the soldiers' home located at Leavenworth, Kans.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Fruitland monthly meeting of Friends, of Kansas, praying the passage of bill (S. 355) providing for an international tribunal of arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, praying for the passage of what is known as the Weaver bill, in relation to the pay of soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of citizens of Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of a bankruptcy law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 330) to remit the forfeiture of the British bark Viscount Canning, and to refund the proceeds of the sale thereof to her owners, Edward D. Morris and C. R. Morris, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1110) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco and their grantees, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1664) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported the bill (S. 1793) to confirm the homestead entry of John Waishkey, jr.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 431) providing for a resurvey of township 12 south, of range 27 east, in Putnam County, Florida, reported it adversely, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 129) to protect homestead settlers within railway limits, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back somewhat modified an amendment, which was referred to that committee, to the bill (S. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned. I ask that the amendment be placed with the bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will accompany the bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. 354) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in respect of any incumbrances on property wherein they have an interest. The bill relates to the subject embraced in the amendment, and I ask that it be laid on the table, in order that, should there be adverse action on the bill to which the amendment relates, this bill may be ready to be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does not the Senator wish to have the bill placed on the Calendar?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not. I ask that it may go on the table, in order that it may be called up if that course shall become necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. 420) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is a duplicate of one that has been before the District Committee and has been by that committee reported favorably. Therefore the bill should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1558) providing for the judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 439) to disqualify justices of the Supreme Court from sitting in the trial of causes which have been previously heard before them in their circuits or otherwise, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the bill may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 1142) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell certain land of the United States in the city of Saint Louis, Mo., introduced by my colleague [Mr. VEST], to report the same back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5876) for the relief of Dinwiddie B. Phillips; and

A bill (H. R. 1732) for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John F. Stewart.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1794) for the relief of Samuel A. B. Woodford, of Clark County, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1795) to amend section 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to reserve agents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1796) for the relief of Charles E Maris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1797) granting a pension to John S. Kirkpatrick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1798) to incorporate the Equitable Gas Company, of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. Three several messages of the President of the United States have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, each of them containing a draught of a bill recommended by the President. I introduce the bills, so that they may be printed in the ordinary form and referred to the committee in the manner most convenient to be considered by the committee. I therefore introduce them for that purpose.

The bill (S. 1799) for the removal of the Eastern Cherokee Indians to the Indian Territory; the bill (S. 1800) to secure to the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands under the act of March 3, 1883; and the bill (S. 1801) for the reappraisement and sale of a certain tract of land of the reservation of the Sac and Fox Indians of the Missouri tribe in the State of Nebraska, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1802) for the relief of Isaac Harter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1803) for the relief of William H. Akins and Jacob D. Felthousen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 1804) to provide for the management and control of the hot springs at Hot Springs, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1805) for the relief of Miss Rosa Wallace; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also (by request) introduced the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 1806) for the relief of the estate of W. W. Adams, deceased;

A bill (S. 1807) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Fenno, deceased;

A bill (S. 1808) for the relief of the legal representatives of Mary H. Pike, deceased; and

A bill (S. 1809) for the relief of J. J. McAlmont.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1810) for the relief Driskill & Sons, Chapman & Tuttle, Payne, Kollar, Phillips Evans, Hunter & Evans, Kollar, McCarty, Colcord, and E. W. and H. F. Spencer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1811) for the relief of Dennis O'Neill, Josiah L. Venable, George H. Boston, James A. Jennifer, Otho Branson, William Blake, and James W. Davenport, Dennis O'Neill & Co., contractors for cleaning alleys in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 53) for the relief of Luther F. Warder; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I introduce the joint resolution intending it as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill. Perhaps it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made, without printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Akins & Felthousen be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A bill (H. R. 5884) to increase the pension of John A. Stewart.

[The foregoing 56 pension bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.]

JOSEPH BAUMER.

Mr. PUGH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to pay Joseph Baumer his salary as messenger from the 1st day of July, 1885, to December 7, 1885.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. VANCE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service Reform, to whom was referred Senate bill 839, to repeal an act approved January 16, 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," be directed to report the same to the Senate forthwith, with such modifications or amendments as to said committee may seem proper.

I ask that the resolution lie on the table, and at a convenient opportunity I propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table, and be printed, under the rule.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 additional copies of Senate bill 1616, a bill to promote the political progress and commercial prosperity of the American nations.

The edition is exhausted, and it is necessary to reprint it, as copies are called for.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

SENATE PASSENGER ELEVATOR.

Mr. PIKE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the feasibility of placing a passenger elevator near the eastern entrance to the Senate extension of the Capitol.

FILES IN ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into the condition and manner of keeping the records and papers in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army which relate to the military history and service of the Federal soldiers engaged in the late war, for the purpose of ascertaining whether such records and papers are properly indexed and arranged, and are so kept as to enable the Adjutant-General to furnish a prompt and correct military history of the Federal soldiers who served in said war. Said committee is also directed to ascertain what, if any, additional expenditures may be required to place said records and papers in proper condition and to make them readily accessible, to the end that complete and accurate reports upon the military service of such soldiers may be more promptly furnished in the adjustment of pension and other claims; and to report the facts to the Senate.

STEREOTYPE PLATES OF MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety of purchasing from William W. Corcoran, esq., the stereotype plates of the Madison Papers.

UNITED LABOR LEAGUE CLAIMS.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to forward to the Senate a list of all claims filed by the United Labor League of America under the act of June 20, 1878, making appropriation for the payment of workingmen of the District of Columbia, showing amount claimed, amount paid, and amount still due to each claimant.

CALENDAR INDEX.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that hereafter the Secretary of the Senate be directed to have the daily Calendar of Business indexed, as has been done at previous sessions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Secretary informs the Chair that that is usually done about this period of the session, not before.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the school bill, as it is called, there were some errors in referring to sections. The numbers of sections were changed from time to time, and the references being in the body of the sections, the Secretary did not feel at liberty to make the necessary changes without the order of the Senate. Is there objection to the changes being made so as to carry out the will of the Senate manifestly shown on the face of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. What is proposed, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The school bill in some sections refers to a certain other section, as, for example, section 8, when it should read section 9, on account of a change made in the numbering of the sections. The Chair is informed there is but one such amendment required, which is in section 12, where a reference is made to section 8, which by the change of sections is really section 9 of the bill, and it is necessary, therefore, to change the text of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that the only change?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only change which has been called to the attention of the Chair. Is there objection to this alteration? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

SENATORS' PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting a statement, in reply to the resolution directing that each Senator shall report the name of his private secretary for publication in the RECORD, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with the following resolution—

"Resolved, That each Senator shall report to the Senate on Monday next the name of his private secretary, by filing the same with the Secretary of the Senate, to be published in the RECORD"—

I have the honor to transmit the accompanying statement.

Very respectfully,

ANSON G. McCOOK, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore Senate United States.

Statement of reports made under Senate resolution of March 3, 1886.

Hon. W. M. EVARTS: Private secretary, H. L. Satterlee.
Hon. G. G. VEST: Private secretary, C. C. Coombs.
Hon. H. E. JACKSON: Private secretary, J. C. McReynolds.
Hon. A. H. COLQUITT: Private secretary, T. C. Howard.
Hon. J. K. JONES: Private secretary, E. L. Givens.
Hon. W. CALL: Private secretary, Mr. Eliot.
Hon. JOHN E. KENNA: Private secretary, J. A. Hutchinson.
Hon. H. B. PAYNE: Private secretary, James Hossach.
Hon. JOHN C. SPOONER: Private secretary, Horace C. Reed.
Hon. J. B. EUSTIS: Private secretary, Ben Hellen.
Hon. JAMES H. BERRY: Private secretary, N. B. Crump.
Hon. E. C. WALTHALL: Private secretary, J. H. Robinson.
Hon. WADE HAMPTON: Private secretary, St. Julian Fillette.
Hon. GEORGE GRAY: Private secretary, Charles W. McFee.
Hon. M. C. BUTLER: Private secretary, E. C. McLure.
Hon. JAMES L. PUGH: Private secretary, James L. Pugh, jr.
Hon. J. N. CAMDEN: Private secretary, F. E. Waterman.

BASIS OF BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. BOWEN. One week ago to-day I suggested to the Senate that on the following Wednesday I should like to call up the bill (S. 1594) providing for a new basis for the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, in order to submit some remarks upon it. When the time arrived the school bill was under consideration, and I thought it best to defer making the request. I ask unanimous consent to be heard now upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business having been closed, the Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that that is simply for the purpose of making a speech?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. FRYE. It will not be unfinished business after that, but will be laid aside then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Colorado desires to address the Senate upon the bill before moving its reference to the Committee on Finance. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BOWEN. There is an error in section 7. I propose to correct it, and also to present now an amendment, which I should like to have incorporated in the bill by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill not yet having been referred, the Senator can modify it if there be no objection.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, I do not claim for the measure I have introduced perfection in details, but the principle it embodies is sound and right. I launch it upon the legislative sea not knowing where it may now cast anchor; but with an abiding faith that some day—and I hope before it is too late—the wisdom of its provisions will be understood and appreciated and its enactment into law an accomplished fact.

Without further preface, therefore, and without the slightest doubt of the correctness of the conclusions at which I have arrived, I will at once proceed to suggest such facts, illustrations, and arguments in its support as will in my judgment best promote my present hope of directing the attention of Congress and the country, not only to the measure proposed but to the many contemporaneous questions necessarily involved.

That legislation on the currency question is necessary admits of no reasonable doubt. No better evidence of this fact can be adduced than the views of prominent gentlemen interested in our national banking system. I will read what a few of them have had to say at the meetings of the American Bankers' Association.

In the year 1881, Mr. George S. Coe, of New York, one of our most prominent bankers and financiers, said:

It is very obvious that the continued reduction of the public debt is fast removing the foundations of the national banking currency, and that the system itself, thus losing its characteristic support, is approaching dissolution. The advancing price of Government bonds consequent upon their gradual diminution in volume, and strengthened by a growing demand for the investment of trust funds of every character, has already made the service of issuing currency profitless to banks, weighed down as they are with heavy burdens of special taxation.

With the certain progress of this reduction and absorption of bonds it is evident that the existence of the present system of banking can not long be protected, and that very soon some substantial change in the basis of our national currency will be inevitable.

The same gentleman said, in 1884:

The consequences of the civil war, which strained every portion of our social structure, have in every other particular been overcome and obliterated, but we are still struggling with financial questions, the last and most difficult of solution, and these questions yet stand in the way of our permanent prosperity. Their true and final settlement are in fact conditions precedent to national tranquillity and peaceful industry. By the rapid payment of the public debt we are confronted with the early extinction of the national banking currency in the form it now exists.

In the same speech he said:

I think we may look forward to so early an extinction of the debt as to compel a radical change in the existing currency; in fact, the demand for the bonds has already advanced the price to a point where it has ceased to be an object to secure it for deposit for currency. The game is not worth the candle. * * * We have yet to meet the currency question in all its phases.

Mr. Charles S. Graham, of New Jersey, said at the same meeting:

One of the most important questions to be considered at the present time is, "What can be done for the continuance of our national-bank note currency?" As is well known, nearly two-thirds of our national-bank circulation is based on the United States 3 per cent. bonds, which bonds are in fact a continuation of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of 1881, pledged as security by the old State banks at the time they reorganized under the national law. These 3 per cent. bonds are being rapidly called in, and many of the national banks in consequence have now little or no circulation, as they decline to replace these with the long bonds at the present market price, now about 120 for the 4 per cent. bonds. It is really a serious question whether the national banking system shall be continued or not, for it is no object to continue in that system without the benefit of circulation.

Hon. Henry W. Cannon, late Comptroller of the Currency, in his report of December 1, 1885, dwells at some length on the same subject. I will read his views from page 15, as follows:

Reasoning upon the theory that the public debt would during the year ending November 1, 1885, continue to be reduced by the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds, and that this production would occasion the reinvestment of trust and other funds invested in threes, and cause a greater demand for and consequent increase in the price of 4 per cent. bonds to a point at which it would be more profitable for the national banks to sell them, the Comptroller estimated in his last annual report to Congress that unless legislation should be secured enabling the banks to issue currency at a fair profit circulation would be reduced at the rate of at least $40,000,000 per annum. It is believed that this estimate would have been substantially correct had the Government continued during 1885 to call and pay the 3 per cent. bonds as rapidly as during the two previous years.

On page 16, same report, he adds:

Unless some measures be taken whereby the banks may be enabled to issue circulation at a reasonable profit to themselves the contraction of national-bank notes will continue. The profit on circulation may be increased by the removal of the tax (and by increasing the amount of currency issued to the par value of the United States bonds deposited); and the Comptroller again respectfully recommends appropriate legislation for that purpose. Even if this be done the national-bank note circulation is still liable to reduction and final disappearance with the reduction and final payment of the debt of the United States.

In his recommendation of appropriate legislation on this subject the Comptroller is right. Our national banks have furnished the country with the best bank currency it has ever had, and next to silver and gold coins and United States notes the best we can ever hope for. But there is one defect of such serious nature that I would rather let the whole system go than to hazard its longer continuance with that one defect remaining; would rather forego all the advantages of the system, and they are many, than to risk the dire disasters which the country stands in constant danger of encountering so long as the banks exist as banks of issue with this one fatal defect in our laws. I refer to the one power which has by our laws been delegated to the banks of regulating the volume of money.

Before giving my reasons upon this point I will remark that after a most thorough and searching examination into the views and opinions of those whose ability and long experience in finance entitle them to be accredited as leaders, I have failed to find any reasons sufficient to satisfy my mind that the country needs national-bank notes at all. On the contrary, I am irresistibly led to the conclusion that the Government, and it alone, should emit the paper currency of the nation.

Among the imposing objections to the issue of paper money directly by the Government which are brandished before us is one which is "covered with the awful hoar of ages," one which is interesting to us only as a traditional belief, and, like many other beliefs which belong to the past and have outlived their usefulness, it dominates over and subjects to its affirmations many of our most careful thinkers. We are told, for example, that Hamilton has said that "the issue of paper money by the Government involves the exercise of powers so dangerous, so liable to abuse, so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an experiment."

If it be true that the exercise of this particular power carries with it a swift and certain hazard—and I do not now challenge the averment—it is none the less true that this may be said of the exercise of other powers with which all modern governments are vested, powers, too, which are essential to the maintenance of their very existence. Our fundamental law discloses many of these powers; and the late fratricidal war through which we have passed brought to light many latent and almost unsuspected powers—tremendous for evil but doubly potent for good—which that august instrument contains. So that it is hardly a legitimate, and certainly not a very forcible, argument to say that a particular governmental power shall not be exercised, because it is at times dangerous and liable to abuse. This is to challenge and deny the principles upon which our free institutions are based, the doctrine of the capacity of the people for self-government. If the people may not be trusted, if their duly chosen Representatives in Congress lack the needed intelligence and uprightness, where are we to seek these essentials? It has not been thought unsafe to intrust to our governmental machinery, to its administrative heads, the issue and disbursement of many thousand millions of the Government's obligations; and all this was done without asking the consent of any agency or agencies foreign to the Government itself.

It issued these obligations, redeemed them, canceled them, and may again do so. Yet who may not repeat to us with sepulchral solemnity the weighty words of Hamilton, "that the exercise of such powers is both seducing and dangerous." This warning is certainly as applicable to the issue of bonds as it is to the issue of paper money. And how is it suggested that these possible seductive influences and dangers are to be withstood or avoided? Where is the guiding higher intelligence to be found, and where the loftier uprightness?

We are told confidently—not confidentially, for it is proclaimed from the house-tops—that the shining qualities we seek, the saving commonsense, and the stainless, unassailable integrity must be sought and can be found only within the charmed circle of the banking institutions of the country. It will be much safer, we are assured, to lodge this power of regulating the volume of the currency with the national banks.

Recalling what I have witnessed in the past, I wish to ask whether there is not danger that the banks will contract the currency when they deem it their interest to do so? Or, if it suited their purposes better to inflate the currency, would they not do that thing? And would they not use these powers for their corporate advantage regardless of the disaster and ruin which might follow from one end of the country to the other? Can anything be plainer than that the power to control the circulating medium should never be placed in the hands of any class or classes or be controlled by any special interests? A power whose exercise affects so intimately the common weal, which may greatly lessen or make intolerable the general needs, the power to make and unmake at will the vehicle of our exchanges, the power to make this just sufficient for our wants absolutely stable and the honest representative of veritable values, this power, I am clear, should be kept precisely where our organic law has lodged it.

The reverend Senators before me are, it is suggested, mere sciolists, and have all the rashness which goes along with imperfect knowledge; and, at the other end of the Capitol, the material, it is said, is not a whit more promising. This declaration of the incapacity of the people's representatives is the burden of much eloquence at the conventions where annually assemble all the financial wisdom of the country, and where it particularly airs itself, and the banks, therefore, stand ready to do our work. They say we are not competent to the task, and furthermore, we lack the needed integrity. Then come these legal fictions, these corporate entities, these fleeting transitory creatures, ephemera almost, whose lives have only the span which the people mete out to them; they in their little, fitful, fluttering existence propose to take upon themselves one of the most important and delicate functions of government—functions only inherent in and which should be inseparable from sovereign power.

Sir, if we had no such thing as national-bank notes and I should be called upon to vote upon the question of authorizing the issue of such notes, my inclination and judgment would be against it, believing that no person, natural or artificial, should have the power to either expand or contract the volume of the circulating medium. Such power should be left in the hands of the people acting through their chosen representatives, who, elected as they are so frequently, could voice the public judgment and will. Stability and certainty as to the amount of money in circulation is a matter of paramount importance, one to be dwelt upon fully and freely until thoroughly considered and comprehended by every person in the land.

The power to contract or expand the circulation means the power to reduce or increase the price of all property and all labor, the power to produce stagnation or unhealthy activity in every branch of industry and enterprise. Why, sir, if from any cause the national banks should suddenly retire their circulation a crash would follow sufficient to shake this country financially from center to circumference, sufficient to paralyze every industry and bankrupt a majority of business men. No such power should be delegated. No corporation, no set of men having business interests of their own to subserve, should be intrusted with it. On the other hand, Congress, representing the whole people, should hold with an unyielding grip this all-important power.

It was only a few years ago—in 1878, as I remember—that the national banks were largely represented here in Washington, threatening to relinquish their charters and retire their circulation if certain things were done or not done. The mere statement of the fact that such power has been delegated to the banks by the Government is sufficient to startle and fill with consternation the mind of every man who comprehends the disastrous effects which would follow close in the wake of a sudden contraction of the currency to the extent possible under the existing laws relating to the retirement of their circulation by national banks.

By the measure I have introduced I am attempting, among other things, to provide a remedy for the ever-present menace and supreme danger which stares us in the face so long as the volume of our circulation depends upon the ever-changing interests of the national banks. These banks are not the guardians of any interests save their own, and they will do, from time to time, whatever they may lawfully do to promote their own success. This is their right, and it is exactly what every person does in every situation in life. Besides this, it is known that the amount of gold and silver produced from our mines is continually fluctuating, so that it does seem that our only safety lies in fixing the amount of our circulating medium by statute, taking from the national banks their power to retire their notes at will, and by authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to keep the volume of money in circulation, as near as may be, up to an amount per capita to be fixed by law, increasing the total volume from year to year proportionately with the increase of population, which as nearly represents the increased uses of money as any basis we can fix upon.

It will be observed that this bill provides for the issue of all money by the Government, and that no retirement and consequent contraction can ever occur. The circulation of the national banks to consist of the same kind of money as the direct circulation of the Government, and provision being made for keeping the whole amount in circulation, the national banks are thus shorn of the dangerous power, which under existing laws they now have, of contracting the volume of currency whenever one or more of them see fit so to do.

It is often asked how a surplus could be kept from accumulating in the Treasury. There are many ways; but I will leave the general discussion of this point until later in the course of my remarks, when I hope to be able to show conclusively how the matter of keeping the vaults of the Treasury fairly free from surplus can always be successfully accomplished. There is no apparent reason existing for having national-bank notes at all, because the legal-tender notes are just as good, each resting on the good faith and permanency of the Government; the first indirectly, having the bonds of the Government deposited in the Treasury as security for their redemption; the second being the direct issues of the same Government, which makes them just as good; indeed the latter is the better money of the two beause its direct legal-tender quality is greater than what the present national-bank notes possess.

The reason why legal-tender notes are shorn of such part of the money function as they are, is that our Government bonds, principal and interest, are expressly made payable in coin; hence the necessity of accumulating coin in the Treasury to meet these obligations and to keep up the reserve fund. To do this we must depend on the coin collected from duties on imports as well as on the coinage of the products of our mines; the latter if all coined as it is mined year by year being inadequate in amount, after deducting therefrom what is used for other purposes, to keep up the reserve and pay the interest on our bonded debt as it falls due.

The basis proposed by my bill for the circulation of the national banks may at first strike many as unsafe, but investigation of the question can not fail to dispel every doubt upon that score. The proposition is to have the national banks deposit with the Treasurer of the United States 70 per cent. of the amount of circulation they may be entitled to under the law; this 70 per cent. to consist of Government bonds, silver and gold coin, one-third of each, and, for the purpose of securing the remaining 30 per cent. of circulation, a statutory lien is created upon the entire assets of the bank which shall have precedence over all other of its liabilities and obligations. This lien, together with the individual liability of the stockholders, can be shown to be ample security. Let it be remembered that the entire amount of the bank circulation is to be money of the nation, so that in no event can the bill-holder sustain loss by a failure of the bank; the point is to make the Government secure as against the banks. The following extract from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency furnishes evidence which, in my mind, amounts to proof of the soundness of the propositions I am advocating. I read from pages 17 and 18 of that report:

> The results of the liquidation of one hundred and four national banks which have failed, and the affairs of which have been liquidated or are in process of liquidation by receivers under the direction of this office, show in a very interesting manner to what extent it may be safe to permit banks under the national system to issue circulation unprotected by a deposit of United States bonds. Of these one hundred and four banks seventy have been finally closed, and for them the results are absolute. The remaining thirty-four are still in process of liquidation, but have progressed so far that the final result can be estimated with comparative accuracy.
> The dividends paid to the creditors of all these banks from the proceeds of their general assets amount to $28,379,080. They had an aggregate capital of $21,858,900, upon which, under the law, they could on deposits or bonds issue 90 per cent., or $19,673,010 of circulation. If at the time of their failure the law had permitted an issue of circulation to the amount of 90 per cent. of capital, unsecured except by a first lien on general assets of the one hundred and four banks mentioned, the note-holders of fifty-eight would have experienced no loss. If the law had authorized an unsecured issue equal to 70 per cent. of capital, the notes of seventy-one of these banks would have been redeemed from the proceeds of their general assets. At 40 per cent. the notes of ninety would have been paid in full, and upon an unsecured issue of 25 per cent. of capital loss to note-holders would have occurred in the case of five banks only or about $62,000 in all.
> The experience with these one hundred and four banks shows almost conclusively that if their issues to the amount of 65 per cent. of their capital had been secured by a deposit of bonds to an equal amount the remaining 25 per cent. might have been issued without other security than a first lien on the general assets, and if a safety fund had been in existence it would in the case cited have been drawn upon to the extent of $63,000 only upon a circulation amounting to $5,464,700. For a beginning, therefore, it might be safe to authorize banks to issue circulation amounting to 90 per cent. of their capital, 70 per cent. to be secured by an equal amount of United States bonds at par value, the remaining 20 per cent. being issued without other security than a first lien on such assets. But if the law should provide for the accumulation of a safety fund in the manner suggested, then as such safety fund increased the percentage of circulation unsecured by bonds might be increased as the diminution of the public debt might require and the safety fund warrant.

The following represents in brief the basis of the paper money circulation in several other nations:

England—banks outside the Bank of England base their circulation upon the aggregate assets of each corporation.

Scotch and Irish banks have no security held against their issues except a first lien on their assets.

Canada—circulation limited to unimpaired paid-up capital. Notes are a first lien on assets.

Austria—secured only by the bank assets.

France—notes of Bank of France are secured only by the bank assets; bank notes are a legal tender.

Germany—imperial bank notes secured to the amount of one-third of issues by the legal-tender notes and coin; remaining two-thirds secured by three-months discounted bills.

Austria—Austria-Hungarian banks may issue 100,000,000 notes without trust security; but must hold sufficient reserve to pay coin on demand.

Netherlands—the national bank may issue its notes without limit, but must carry 40 per cent. coin or bullion to meet notes and deposits.

Denmark—Bank of Copenhagen notes may be issued without limit, other than security upon general assets of the bank. Metallic reserve must not fall below three-eighths of circulation.

Sweden—the Bank of Sweden's notes are secured by a coin or bullion reserve of 40 per cent. of its issues.

From this it appears that we are not without abundant precedents for the proposed basis, and that the plan I advocate is not Utopian. It may be urged that this lien on the entire assets of the bank, including deposits, will have a tendency to impair the confidence of depositors in the banks. The experience of bankers as well as depositors does not bear out this idea. People put their money in bank to avoid danger of loss by accident or theft, and because it is the custom in the business world to do business through banks. Depositors have faith in the experience, honesty, and ability of their banker; his credit is good with them for these reasons; besides which the individual liability of each stockholder makes his property outside of his banking interests liable, thus furnishing additional security; all of which, considered in connection with the fact that only one-third of the bank's circulation depends for its security on the assets of the bank, sets at rest all questions touching the comparative safety of depositors, more especially when it is remembered that the plan embodied in this bill, while it continues the tax of 1 per cent. per annum on the circulation of the banks, sets aside in the Treasury the amount thus accumulated as a safety fund, to be used for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for any loss sustained by reason of the inability of a failing national bank to return the amount of legal-tender notes previously issued to it for purposes of circulation not secured by the 70 per cent. of silver, gold, and United States bonds deposited.

That the basis proposed for the issue of circulation to the banks is sound I think will not be questioned. If this be true, it is assuredly wise to adopt it as it can not be disputed that it is better for the banks. If any national banker doubts this let him make a calculation in which he may consider his silver and gold deposited as dead capital, and he will find that the use of his increased amount of circulation and the interest on his deposit of bonds will show a profit of more than 1 per cent. greater than under the present system, to say nothing of the premium he may realize on his bonds liberated from the Treasury and nothing of the benefits of having his circulating notes possess the same money function as all other Government legal-tender notes; better for the Government, because it will fill the Treasury with immense sums in metallic money, thereby strengthening its reserves and giving practicability to our professions of having resumed specie payment, which, in point of fact, is now more a matter of imagination than of fact, and is only maintained because the people have faith in our legal-tender notes for the reason that they have faith in the permanency of the Government and in our steady advancement in national power and wealth. This faith so long as it remains unshaken is a sure guarantee that the people will not lessen our specie reserve, small and weak as it now is, by demanding payment in coin for their legal-tender notes.

History teaches us that the faith and credit alone of a great nation—blessed with a stable government and a conservative financial policy—furnishes a fairly safe basis for its circulating notes. This country is happily so blessed. Upon this faith and credit, but without the stability, our legal-tender notes were equal to the extreme exigencies of a civil war unparalleled in the annals of history. Now, if we can back up these notes by an accumulation of large amounts of coin in the Treasury, which will certainly transpire if this bill becomes a law, we will then be as near an actual specie basis as the limited production of our mines will permit; certainly near enough to guarantee unlimited confidence which amounts to about the same thing as coin until shaken, because a specie basis is founded on coin and confidence. Many years ago banks of issue—State banks and private banks—furnished us with practical illustrations of the effects and results of an imaginary specie basis; their affairs ran smoothly so long as they sailed upon sunny summer financial seas, but they abandoned their pretended specie basis and stranded on the rocks of bankruptcy and ruin whenever met by gales of doubt and suspicion and the cyclones of financial distress and panic. Confidence is all-sufficient so long as it is indulged in generally, but coin is the only bulwark when confidence is dead. In nearly every instance of financial trouble and panic these banks, with few exceptions, suspended specie payment. They suspended in 1814, in 1837, in 1839, and the suspensions lasted for many years. They again suspended in 1857 and finally in 1861, and have never resumed.

These facts show the absurdity of all attempts on the part of banks to maintain specie payments without abundant coin in times of financial distress; but it is different with the Government, because it enjoys the confidence of the people so universally; so much more so than any bank can that it can maintain a specie basis with less coin. So that taking things as we now find them a law like the one proposed will surely put a large additional amount of coin in the Treasury, not only that deposited by the national banks as a basis for their circulation, but likewise by the collection of custom duties in coin and by the purchase and coinage of more silver than is now being done. We may rest assured that a knowledge that our coin reserves are surely, steadily, and continually increasing will so increase the public confidence in the Government that belief, faith, and confidence will be practically understood and treated as synonymous with such an expression as fixed fact.

Lest the section of the bill providing for the temporary suspension of specie payments by the Government in times of panic and excitement, shall bring upon myself and the measure unjust criticism, I will anticipate it by answering in advance. The Government stands in a very different attitude from a bank professing to pay in specie, which suspends. Under such circumstances the bank must close its doors, quit business, and finally fail if it can not in a reasonable time resume. But this is not true of the Government, because it proclaims that its suspension is but temporary to prevent panic and financial disaster, and the business world would understand and applaud the act, because, instead of weakening confidence in it, the very reverse would be true, especially when the fact would be that during the suspension coin would continue with a regular flow into the Treasury from the sources I have mentioned. It is a fact, and every business man knows it, that a large majority of the failures of honest men in business could be avoided if they could do what is equivalent to a suspension by the Government. They could in nearly every instance pull through and save themselves and their creditors if they could on their own motion suspend payment, call in their debts, and wind up their affairs. But as they are not permitted to do this they fail. Each creditor being anxious to get in his claim one attachment follows another in hot haste to the extent of destroying general confidence in the ability of the man to pay, whatever may be thought of his integrity.

The Government can not be subjected to such pressure; it can not be sued; so that when it suspends, that is the end of its trouble on this score, and no one will complain, because they know it will resume whenever the crisis, no matter from what cause, passes over.

Nothing but good can result from such a course when necessary to be pursued; business will go right along, the expenses of the Government will be promptly paid in legal-tender notes, which in periods of great trouble have proven themselves equal to the emergency. If suspension of specie payment by the Government involved the suspension of its business or the business of the people it could not, of course, be thought of. But no such things can happen, because under this plan no one but the Government professes to be doing business on a specie basis. Suspension of specie payment has been considered the wisest of financial steps by nearly all the governments on earth in times of financial distress. Take France and England for example. The Royal Bank of France suspended in 1720. A run was made on the Bank of France for specie in 1848, and the bank suspended by order of the government. The Bank of England suspended in 1720. The Bank of France again in 1870 by order of the government. The Bank of England suspended in 1797 by direction of Parliament, and remained suspended until 1823.

When everybody knows that the Government will not allow itself to be drained of specie by a run, no run will ever begin. Hence I say it is wise to accumulate metallic money in the Treasury, keep on increasing the amount to the utmost limit, give the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, the power to temporarily suspend and to resume specie payments from time to time; and, above all things, let the United States alone profess to pay in coin, in which, if it is successful, the whole country is virtually on a specie basis, certainly as near it as we shall ever be until the augmenting volume of specie reserves in the Treasury, from sources already indicated, shall have gained on the increasing volume of paper currency, based on increasing population, to the extent necessary to show a regularly continuing ratio of increase of the specie as compared with the paper, and the possibility of the ultimate realization of, not a mere specie basis, but an actual metallic money circulation represented by its more convenient paper representative, dollar for dollar.

The present production of the precious metals does not justify the belief that we shall ever witness the financial millennium described; but it is nevertheless wise to put and keep ourselves in line by proper laws, to reach as far as we can in that direction. Who, after all, can tell? All the great mountain ranges in the center and western part of the continents of North and South America, reaching from beyond far-off Alaska to Cape Horn, constitute one vast mineral belt with capabilities of mineral production almost beyond computation. The great developments made in numerous places up to this time, when we consider their relation to the whole of this great belt, are but as a drop in the bucket. Who after all can fix or even approximate a limit to the volume of metallic money while our hardy prospector keeps on from year to year, pushing farther and still farther into these comparatively unexplored mountain fastnesses, seeking gain for himself by discovery of new mines, while at the same time he is planting the advance mile-stones of progress, civilization, Christianity, and human freedom.

Mr. President, having thus briefly outlined a plan by which we can have a sound national currency, freed from all the dangers attendant upon a delegation of one of the most important of powers—I refer to the power of contracting or expanding the circulation. I pass to the consideration of the remaining section of the proposed law, that relating to the volume of money.

The last annual statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated November 1, 1885, gives substantially the following (I speak in round numbers) as the total paper issues of the country, including legal tender, national-bank notes, and outstanding gold and silver certificates: Legal tender, three hundred and forty-seven millions, gold certificates, one hundred and nine millions, silver certificates, ninety-three millions, and national bank notes, three hundred and sixteen millions; making a total of paper amounting to eight hundred and sixty-five millions. The amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the country is somewhat conjectural. Taking, however, the authority above cited, which probably does not understate the amount, I find that the aggregate of coin and bullion is as follows: Gold and gold bullion, five hundred and eighty-seven millions; silver and silver bullion, three hundred and seven millions; making a total of eight hundred and ninety-four millions. Hence the grand total of coin and paper issues amounts to seventeen hundred and fifty-nine millions; but this aggregate must not be taken to represent the active circulation of the country, that which is distributed among the people, as I shall plainly show.

In order to ascertain what amount is available to the country as a circulating medium, there must obviously be deducted from the gross aggregate I have given, first, the amount of reserves withheld by national banks taking the minimum amount fixed by the statute; next, it is equally evident there should be deducted the amount of gold and silver in the Treasury represented by the outstanding gold and silver certificates issued by it; and, next, the balance of gold and silver remaining in the Treasury, because this sum must be retained there as a reserve fund, weak as it is, for the maintenance of specie payments and to meet the other coin obligations of the Government. The amounts of these items are as follows:

National-bank reserves, two hundred and fifty-five millions; gold and silver in Treasury representing outstanding gold and silver certificates, two hundred and two millions; balance of gold and silver in the Treasury, two hundred and forty millions. These several items, bank reserves, gold and silver in the Treasury to redeem gold and silver certificates, and gold and silver necessary to maintain specie payments amount to, in round numbers, six hundred and ninety-seven millions. But there are other items which must be added to this aggregate. These I find in a report of the Treasurer of the United States dated January 30, 1886. From this report it appears that in addition to the foregoing there is in the Treasury and withheld from circulation the following: Legal-tender notes held for redemption of national-bank notes, forty-eight millions; national-bank notes for redemption of national-bank notes, twenty-four millions; adding these to the previous total will make a total of seven hundred and sixty-nine millions.

Deducting this sum from the total of paper and metallic currency now existing in this country, as heretofore stated, shows that the entire amount of active circulating medium available to sixty millions of people is a fraction less than $1,000,000,000. This is the sum of the currency shown to be in active circulation if only the bank reserves, which the law requires, are deducted. In point of fact the volume of reserves now exceeds the legal requirements by $160,000,000; so that the volume of active circulation is still further reduced by this additional amount so withheld. It will therefore be seen, and this is a point to which I now beg to call the special attention of the Senate and the country, that the maximum amount of active currency which is possible, the very furthest limit to which we can go under existing laws, is barely sixteen and a half dollars per capita, while the actual active circulation of to-day is less than $14 per capita. I must emphasize the fact that the bank reserves of $255,000,000, a proportion of the deposit of the national banks rigorously fixed by law to be retained in their vaults—that these millions, imposing as they are, do not add one dollar to the actual circulating medium of the country.

It is a circulating medium which shall not circulate. It has its functions to perform, valuable and necessary indeed, and that function is to remain "fixed and motionless" in the strong boxes of the national banks. To part with one dollar of it is to violate the positive statutes of the land, no less than sound and accepted principles of banking. But equally true is it that all of the gold and silver thus held in the vaults of the Treasury is, for purposes of circulation, as valueless as if it did not exist. If it were in the depths of the Atlantic it would not be more completely beyond reach; it is a sacred trust, and set apart for what? First, to provide for the redemption of one hundred and nine millions of gold and ninety-three millions of silver certificates issued by the Treasury, which are now a part of the circulating medium of the country, and which, as heretofore stated, I have included in the aggregate of paper issues; and second, the remaining gold and silver in the Treasury, amounting to two hundred and forty millions, are held there by a law more imperative than human statutes. These millions must stay there, as we all understand, and can not safely be diminished, so long as there are $347,000,000 of legal-tenders in circulation to be maintained upon a specie basis. I am aware that the coin of the Treasury, or so much of it as is necessary, is also set apart and pledged for the payment of the accruing interest on the public debt; yet I have assumed, though I have not hitherto formally stated the fact, that the coin derived from duties on imports will more than suffice for this purpose.

But there is another source of diminution or contraction. This is to be found in the losses which have resulted from the destruction and wearing out of a certain per cent. of our paper currency; processes which have been at work for the last twenty years or more. This incident of contraction has not been taken into account by the Treasury officials, whose statements of the paper circulation of the country I have accepted for purposes of discussion; statements based wholly upon the official record of notes issued and of notes redeemed or retired; statements based upon the erroneous hypothesis that all notes not redeemed or retired are still in circulation.

The amount of loss or diminution of the paper issues from the causes mentioned I will not undertake to estimate. Yet when we reflect upon the vast sums of paper which have been in circulation since 1862 we can not escape the conclusion that it must reach many millions. We are therefore safe in assuming that, taking only official data for our guide, the active currency, paper and metallic, in the country may not exceed twelve or thirteen dollars per capita. Will it be maintained by any one who has gone beyond the horn-book in questions of finance that this per capita of circulation is sufficient for the commercial and industrial needs of the country? Evidently it is not considered sufficient by those gentlemen who have taxed their faculties to invent or manufacture, or those who complacently accept statements in which the per capita of circulation in the United States is set down at $36.80, or nearly treble the actual per capita.

I have before me such a statement, to be admired for the audacity, or to be excused, perhaps, for the ignorance which characterizes it. Surely no common man could have produced it; the uniqueness of the effort lifts or lowers him into a distinct category. It may have been the product of much thinking, but with a form of thought with which facts and figures had little to do. To make plain how completely the actual figures have been ignored or juggled with I shall now read from a statement I find in the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated November 1, 1885. This gives in detail the total amount of coin and currency in the country at that date:

Gold and bullion	$586,727,787
Silver coin and bullion	307,658,827
Legal-tender notes	346,681,016
National-bank notes	315,847,163
Total	1,556,914,793

Or, in round numbers, a total of one thousand five hundred and fifty-seven millions of metallic and paper currency. This statement includes all bullion and subsidiary coin, that which is in the Treasury vaults and in circulation, and including, of course, all of the bank reserves. Now, taking this aggregate, only 66 per cent. of which can possibly enter into the active circulation of the country, we find that this sum will give less than $26 per capita, instead of the $36.80 of which we have heard, while the actual per capita of active circulation does not, as I have demonstrated, probably exceed twelve or thirteen dollars.

But, Mr. President, behind and beyond all this there is still another source of contraction, which, like a slow poison, does its work surely and steadily and with a certainty which knows no cessation or deviation, and that is the fact that while our population is constantly and rapidly increasing the volume of our money is stationary, indeed it is even now being reduced in amount. This is as much a source of contraction of the currency as if our population were stationary and the volume of circulation was being reduced.

Precisely what amount of circulating medium is demanded by the business interests of the country is, I am ready to admit, a debatable question. But I am clear that the volume of currency, paper or metallic, should never be left to chance. It must not be left to that imagined self-adjusting, self-regulating, automatic process which finds place only in the dreams of the visionary. There exists no such clock-work arrangement in finance. Unfortunately with the people collectively, as with the individual man, the appetite for more money grows upon what it feeds. We do not want the era of the assignats repeated in the United States. There must be a distinct limitation to its volume. It should be definitely and absolutely fixed by law, flexible only in allowing for such increase as the increase of population and growth of business may show to be necessary.

The rule which, in my opinion, closely approximates to the true one is, that the volume of our circulation should be just large enough and no larger, so that money will be just as desirable and not more so than property. This does not mean an inflated currency, and it is equally opposed to contraction—extremes to be avoided at all times and under all circumstances. Under this rule money would not be hoarded, nor could the present state of affairs exist. Money would not be lying idle in the great money centers; it would continually seek investment in new fields of enterprise and industry. Times would be good and all would have a fair chance in the great race of life. Thousands who do not now know where their next sack of flour will come from would then feel that to them were opened equal opportunities with the rest of mankind, and they could see that by persistent and intelligent labor and frugality not only a way to earn a support for themselves and those dependent upon them, but also a fair prospect of laying up a reasonable competency sufficient to educate their children and meet the exigencies of sickness, misfortune, and old age.

Yet aside from the tentative rule I have stated there are other methods of determining what should be the volume of the currency; not with absolute, but with sufficient exactness for our purpose. Our condition as a people is not so peculiar or anomalous that we may not be instructed and in a measure guided by the experiences and experiments of other nations. Looking at that country and the people whose business methods and habits and varied interests most nearly resemble our own, and from whom we get our language and laws, what do we find? What do we ascertain is the actual circulating volume of money required in the United Kingdom of Great Britain? Deriving my information from reliable sources, I find that the currency in active circulation in Great Britain for the year 1884 amounted to $23.70 per capita. This must not be understood to mean the whole of the circulating medium. In order to make the comparison a just one, I have deducted the amounts of bank reserves in this statement of per capita circulation, as I did when I gave the per capita of the active circulation of the United States.

This volume of currency is found to be necessary in a country densely populated, with business centers crowding one another by their proximity, thickly studded with banks, where checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and other kinds of commercial paper are used to an extent far beyond what would be practicable here.

Our vast area alone (thirty times that of Great Britain), the relative sparseness of our population, the distances between our cities and consequent lack of ready intercourse, all the differences so far as the two countries do differ, unerringly indicate that if $23.70 is the proper amount of the per capita circulation of Great Britain a larger per capita is imperatively demanded for the United States. We see that to-day our active per capita is a little more than one-half of that of Great Britain. Expanded to its utmost lawful limit it will not equal two-thirds.

Now let us turn to France and see what is the actual per capita of circulation there. The paper circulation of France is issued by one institution, the Bank of France. Its notes are a full legal tender, and there is no direct limitation of their volume except during a suspension of specie payments. At such periods the government controls the issue.

There are now five hundred and seventy millions of bank notes in circulation. The metallic circulation consists of six hundred millions of silver and eight hundred millions of gold; making a total of over two thousand millions of paper and metal money. Deducting from this total an amount of gold and silver for a reserve fund equal to the paper issues, so as to put these on a specie basis, leaves as the active circulating medium of the country, in round numbers, $1,500,000,000. This amount gives within a fraction of $43 per capita; and yet no French statesman or financier claims that the volume of the circulating medium is too large.

The territory of France has an area of 200,000 square miles, or one-eighteenth the area of the United States. It has one inhabitant for every 3.4 acres of its territory. The United States has an inhabitant for every 38 acres. Yet France, so Frenchmen affirm, needs $43 per capita. I need hardly describe it in detail, for its peculiarities are well known. It is a country at once compact and thickly settled. Money, therefore, as a medium of exchange may be used a score of times over while in this country that money would be in transitu between money centers. Here it would be for the time practically withdrawn from circulation. Consequently $1 of the circulating medium in France represents as a vehicle of exchange, from the facility with which its use may be repeated, as explained, considerably more than $1 of our circulation. In no wise do the conditions in France, except as I have stated, differ from those existing in this country so far as these have any relation to the question of the required volume of the circulating medium. The people of France like the people of this country are largely engaged in agriculture. Like ourselves they have their diversified industries and an import and export trade in extent rivaling our own. But in order that we may properly apprehend and appreciate the transforming effects of a sound financial system, let us glance at the checkered fortunes of France for the past century, the frequent changes of government, rarely peaceful changes, and when violent marked by the terrific violence which was the measure of the misgovernment which preceded these revolutions. From the time of the constituent or first national assembly that fated nation has only emerged from one revolution to be precipitated into another. Following the execution of Louis XVI came a long period of legislative or governmental disorder during which faction struggled and intrigued against faction, while the great material industrial interests of the people were either trampled under foot or were wholly neglected by the ruling power. These civil commotions, to use a mild phrase, lasted ten years, and were marked throughout by incessant and ferocious internal strife and bloodshed; at the same time the nation was also engaged in foreign wars which were decimating and impoverishing the people. Then came the reign of Napoleon with fifteen years of almost uninterrupted war. Napoleon's were gigantic wars which involved all Europe and left France laden with enormous debt, and with almost all private fortunes swept away. Then followed a short era of peace only to see the people again change rulers and dynasties.

Again, in less than two decades Louis Phillipe disappeared and France exchanged a monarchy for a republic, to be suddenly transformed into an empire under Louis Napoleon. His reign like that of his great relative was marked by wars and culminated in supreme disaster. This left France, just fifteen years ago, shorn of two of her provinces, with a stupendous indemnity of 5,000,000,000 francs to pay to her victor, with her people prostrated and humiliated and carrying the largest national debt in existence—a debt more than treble ours. This brief summary shows through what appalling trials that country has passed; how it has been torn by revolutions and despoiled and impoverished by successive wars. Yet France has survived them all and to-day is the most prosperous nation in Europe if not in the world. To what does she owe her marvelous recovery from the accumulated disasters of a century? Her people are industrious and economical, but so are the English and Germans. She enjoys no special advantages of soil or climate; she has no great seaports with unrivaled harbors to shelter her commerce. But there she stands in advance of all the nations and on the high-road to genuine prosperity.

What can account for so surprising, so exceptional a spectacle? How and wherein does she differ from other nations? We have seen that others have the same or similar climate and soil and people. What is the striking or subtle difference which so helps France and so hinders the other nations of the earth? It is not immunity from the ordinary forms of taxation, for she is the most heavily taxed nation on this planet. Yet it is in her immunity from taxation after all, from taxation in its most grievous and oppressive form, from the taxation which comes from a deficient circulating medium, than which nothing can be more intolerable or weigh more heavily upon a people. In France, with her abundant currency largely made up of silver coin, the money is diffused among the people. Here, where the circulation is insufficient, it becomes concentrated; it gravitates to the money-centers. If it were sufficient for the people's use it would be found in the hands of the people, it would be distributed among all classes as in France, and as a certain result we should have here, as in France, a thriving and contented people.

We are told that in these days of rapid communication by telegraph we need less money than heretofore, that it can be transmitted with such facility and rapidity that we can do more business with less money. To a certain extent only is this true. It is easy enough to transmit money rapidly if we have it to our credit somewhere, but this does not reach the difficulty, because when money is contracted the man who starts without any can never get ahead; the greater the volume the greater the ease with which we get it, so that the main point is not the facility for transmitting it, but in the difficulty in having any to transmit when the volume is too small. To better the condition of that great majority of mankind who have no money—so great that it is nearly unanimous—is the prime consideration. It is this great majority that is ground to powder by contracted currency. Banks and men who are rich and deal in money are benefited by the very thing which ruins the rest of the people, for the reason that the rich, who deal directly in money and securities readily converted into it, have only in stringent times to sit still and add to the volumes of their millions in cash by the depreciation in the price of property and labor which is ever the handmaid of a contracted volume of money.

Contract the currency one-half, and the man who contracted debts before that time has to work two days to pay his debt instead of one. It is said by some that there is plenty of money now, and we are pointed to the fact that in all the great money centers there is abundance of it and to the additional fact that it loans at a very low rate of interest, 2 per cent. per annum, on call loans. Out of their own mouths do we convict these gentlemen, for a plethera of money at the great centers is positive proof of scarcity everywhere else; there being but just so much altogether in the whole country, it is perforce true that the more there is at the centers the less there is elsewhere, and this is exactly the trouble now. Can any one deny the present contracted state of the circulation at this time? The coinage of silver has hardly supplied the place made vacant by the retirement of national-bank notes, and there is on the whole less money now than several years ago. Still our population has been increasing at the rate of more than 3 per cent. per annum, and consequently the uses of money in the same proportion.

Yet in the face of all this we are told that we have plenty of money. Under such circumstances how easy it is for the great centers to be flush of ready cash. The leading men who deal directly in it know all these things; begin hoarding; money gets less plentiful for active business purposes; enterprise and business can not reach it, therefore it languishes, and so it goes on "fattening upon what it feeds" until second-rate capitalists and financiers catch the inspiration and they begin to prepare for a rainy day, and are swiftly followed by lesser lights until men with first-class legitimate enterprises but without sufficient money curtail and suspend operations, and labor finds no just remuneration. These deplorable conditions could never be reached with an ample volume of circulation.

Now let us recur to the power of the national banks over the amount of our circulating medium. We find from the utterances of men other than those I have mentioned connected with these institutions—constituting, let us hope, a minority—that the burden of their song is to retire all the legal-tenders and constitute national-bank notes as the sole paper money of the country. This disposition to grasp power means something, and that something is their desire to be able to expand or contract the money of the country to suit their own interests. Shall this power be granted, or shall we take from them that heretofore delegated? Wisdom points only to the latter course, and wisdom in this instance is supplemented by right and justice. Let us give them the liberal basis I have proposed for their circulation, but never, never leave them with the power to crush struggling humanity through the medium of contraction.

And here I wish to deal with the popular fallacy—a fallacy which confronts us at every step—which has become an apothegm. This fallacy is to be found in the assertion that when there is an abundance of money, that then it may be obtained at a low rate of interest; and the rate at which money is loaned at our great money centers is pointed to as irresistible evidence that there is no lack of money in the country. Those who maintain this proposition are misled by a false analogy. Plenty of money, they say, compels a low rate of interest, and a low rate of interest proves in turn that there is plenty of money. Now the error and the false assumption lie in mistaking the earning power of money for its purchasing power. It is absolutely true, and no one thinks of denying it, that the exchangeable value of money, or its purchasing power, bears a certain inverse proportion to the volume of money there is in circulation.

In this particular money is precisely like wheat or any other commodity; make it plenty and you make it cheap. If you are buying wheat when money is abundant, you must pay a higher price or you must give more money for it. In other words, you will get less wheat for a given sum of money; hence it becomes literally cheap money, because you get it by paying a smaller consideration for it. But does it follow from this that when you want to borrow money you should get it at a low rate of interest? The two transactions—of borrowing money and buying money—are far from being identical, though generally assumed to be so. We all know that along with abundant money comes a period of great business activity and enterprise. The growing and multiplied commercial and industrial interests of the country need money; hence borrowers are also multiplied. A borrowing demand for money is created, and, responsive to this demand, the rates of interest are raised. Consequently, when money is abundant the borrowing rates are high.

And on the other hand when there is a scarcity of money in the country, an artificial or a real scarcity, its exchangeable value, its purchasing power becomes greater. We see that more of the commodities can be bought with a given amount—to use a familiar phrase, prices are then low—yet by an inexorable law, the earning power of money, as represented by interest, has fallen. Borrowers may get it at a lower rate of interest; but the security exacted must stand a rigorous scrutiny. But it is said that the difficulty of getting money nowadays is not owing to the scarcity of money, but to the scarcity of collaterals on the part of the would-be borrowers. This is witty enough to be true; yet it is not true. Every youth in a broker's office knows that collaterals which are perfectly acceptable in ordinary times are wholly unavailable during a stringency in the money market. At such times the collaterals required must be susceptible of instant conversion into money, and quotations must show that the proffered securities are well up toward the nineties.

Fair business collaterals which a few months before were unchallenged are now summarily "thrown out" by banks and brokers, and I assert that there is no lack of the collaterals which for years were good enough; but the lack of money brought with it a demand for a different species of security. The collaterals must be gilt-edged. The masses of the people during these periods are poor, wages are low, products, agricultural and others, are cheap because money has an enhanced value. At such times money will buy more for a given sum, which is only saying that money is dear. The contraction goes on; for those who have money continue to hoard. Capital becomes more and more timid because the prices of commodities are low and the tendency seems to still lower prices. It is a well-known law of the stock market that there is brisk buying when stocks are high and advancing, and it is sluggish when prices are low and falling. Business everywhere comes to a standstill; borrowers are few, firstly, because they can see no direction in which money can be profitably or safely employed; and secondly, because, as already stated, of the difficulty of furnishing security which the lender will accept. Therefore, the demand for money becomes limited and the interest upon money, its earning capacity, drops.

Repeating what I have said in axiomatic form, I say when there is a redundant circulating medium prices are high and the rate of interest is high; when the circulated medium is contracted, prices are low and the rate of interest is also low. More briefly still, the prices of commodities and the rates of interest rise and fall with the volume of the currency. There may be periods of paralysis in the money market when this law may seem to fail, but, under normal conditions, the law of gravitation is not more assured or regular.

At this point I will notice certain parts of a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, of date March 2, 1886, unique, bold, able, and the most complete and radical exposition of the gold monometallic position—sailing, however, declaredly under the bimetallic flag—which has ever been promulgated thoroughly in the interests of the gold monometallists, but full of expressions in favor of that kind of bimetalism which favors the present demonetization of silver as the sure road to ultimate bimetallism. "Let us fear the Greeks bearing gifts."

This I believe to be a fair statement of its purport, but to avoid any and all possibilities of mistake I will read now from page 10 of the printed letter, as follows:

(2) The Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large direct the issue and prescribe the more or less limited uses of several kinds of currency. To but one do they assign the office of a standard. They named the unit of all these currencies and of our money of account with the name—dollar. To but one dollar do they assign the function of a unit of value.

The law of February 12, 1873, sec. 14, (R. S., 3511), reads as follows:

"The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which at the standard weight of 25.8 grains shall be the unit of value." * * *

Thus the gold dollar, circulating amid all other dollars, then existing or thereafter to be issued, whatever their substance, description or kind "shall be the unit of value." The law is unrepealed and unmodified. No other statute of the United States now in force refers to that office, uses the phrase, or names the thing. The function of the gold dollar as the unit of value is therefore unqualified and unquestionable. Its office as a unit of value was once shared with fifteen times, afterward with sixteen times its weight of silver. Its employment in that behalf is now unshared and sole. Its value is the unit of value, its measure is made the only measure. To that measure every other dollar must conform, while other dollars exist and this law of Congress stands. The simplicity of the language makes definition itself difficult, but dispute impossible. It has made my duty clear.

In reply therefore to the summons of the House, mindful of that duty and my oath, I respectfully answer that while the law remains what it is, I shall endeavor in the future as I have endeavored in the past to conform my official acts to the letter and spirit of its plain requirements, and to so exercise every discretionary power with which it is the pleasure of Congress that my office be vested over the contents, the outgoes, and the surplus of the Treasury, as to maintain every other dollar of their creation in such use and circulation as consists with the preservation of their practical commercial parity with the gold dollar, testing that equality exclusively by the sole "unit of value."

The Secretary's quotations from the law of February 12, 1873, seems to be literal, but his interpretation of it is too wide of the mark to let go unchallenged.

He says the law "is unrepealed and unmodified." I admit it is "unrepealed," but deny that it is "unmodified." That all statutes relating to the same subject must be construed in pari materia is one of the rules of construction universally accepted, will, of course, be conceded.

Applying this rule to the section of the statute of February 12, 1873, upon which the Secretary of the Treasury bases his conclusions, and the subsequent statute of 1878, in the first section of which we find the following:

That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act, which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

Now, construing these two statutes together we find that both can stand for the reason that they are not inconsistent with each other.

Were it otherwise, the act of 1873 would stand repealed under the express repealing section of the act of 1878.

Both these statutes being therefore in force, and by which it appears that we have two distinct coin dollars, one of gold and one of silver, each being a full legal tender for all debts public and private, each absolutely and unconditionally the equal under the law of the other, the strained and narrow construction of the honorable Secretary is glaringly manifest when he contends that the gold dollar is the sole unit of value to which "every other dollar must conform."

He plants himself squarely on the ground that because the law of 1873 declared in terms that the gold dollar should be "the unit of value," that it is the sole unit of value. He says:

No other statute of the United States refers to that office, uses the phrase, or names the thing.

This sort of construction will not stand the tests. Every lawyer knows that the name at the head of or in the body of a written instrument does not determine just what it is. It is the substance, the effect of what the instrument contains, which determines what it is, whether deed, bond, lease, or what not.

Every layman knows if two horses are standing together, to one of which is attached a card or notice saying, "This is a horse," and the other being without such attachment or designation, that nevertheless the one is just as much a horse as the other. Right here it might occur to some that the same reasoning would apply to and make a greenback dollar a unit of value also, but there is this distinction: While the greenback is a legal tender generally, there are two kinds of debts which it can not lawfully pay—customs dues and interest on the public debt—besides which it is not a dollar but merely a promise to pay a dollar.

There are but two kinds of dollars known to the laws of this country—one of gold and the other of silver—the weight and fineness of each being fixed by law and each having the same full money functions, being full legal tender for all purposes.

These dollars, therefore, are both units of value, one just as much as the other. To say that the gold dollar is the sole unit of value is to say that the currency of this country is on a monometallic basis. This is the effect of the special pleading of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary says, in the last paragraph which I have read from his letter:

I shall endeavor in the future, as I have endeavored in the past, to conform my official acts to the letter and spirit of its [the law's] plain requirements.

The spirit of the law of 1878, remonetizing silver, involved the change of the currency of this country from a monometallic basis to a bimetallic basis. If this be true, are there not two kinds of dollars, each of which is a unit of value? And must not the Secretary recognize them both if he lives up to the spirit of the laws of 1873 and 1878? Or are we to understand from his letter, where he says—

And to so exercise every discretionary power, with which it is the pleasure of Congress that my office be vested, over the contents, the outgoes, and the surplus of the Treasury, as to maintain every other dollar of their creation in such use and circulation as consists with the preservation of their practical commercial parity with the gold dollar, testing that equality exclusively by the sole unit of value—that he intends to treat the silver dollar as an article of commerce measured by his sole unit of value—the gold dollar—and without any regard whatever to the nominal or coin value of the silver dollar created by the law of 1878? I propound this interrogatory because I need to be enlightened on this point and not with any intention of answering it myself.

Further on in his letter the Secretary says:

It is a wise step in the interest of the industries jeopardied by doubt to end the increasing risk of expelling our gold.

This is the cry of the single-standard gold men, who will no doubt extract many crumbs of comfort from the words of our bimetallic Secretary.

The startling cry is heard from them on every hand that continued silver coinage will drive our $550,000,000 of gold coin out of the country. Why? We do not need to purchase more than we sell. If the amount of our purchases abroad just equals our sales, there will be no balance of trade either way, and we will still have our $550,000,000 of gold, with an addition each year of the amount of gold mined in this country, should the amount be more than what is used in the arts, &c.

England can not pay us except in gold, because no foreign coin is a legal tender here. They used to be, but all laws making them so have long since been repealed. England can not afford to bring silver here at a loss of 20 per cent, which would have to be done, because until made coin of the United States we would not take it except at its bullion value. Hence, I say, that unless we buy abroad more than we sell abroad our gold can not, by any legitimate trade or commerce, escape us, and I may add that we do not need to buy more than we sell.

In point of fact we do not need to buy a dollar's worth of anything abroad, because we are nearer self-supporting than any European country. We raise more food than we need, more cotton and wool, out of which we can make our own clothing, than we need, and can get along splendidly without French broadcloth, silks, laces, or foreign wines, so that we have nothing to do but to make up our minds that we are self-sustaining, and that settles it.

Suppose that we had no money whatever with which to purchase anything abroad, and that we should neither buy nor sell anything except among ourselves, and, in consequence, England should do the same thing, which country would have the best of it? I answer without hesitation that we would. If every country save this should sink, leaving us the sole people in existence, I can not see but that we would be at least as well off as we are now. If the nations of the earth constituted one brotherhood we would be the losers, because I say that, without a single exception, we have more resources and can support and take care of ourselves easier than any other nation of people, and would to-day be in a better condition without than with the others. But I do not wish to be understood as expressing any desire to sink the rest of the world to the bottom of the sea, carrying down the millions of souls in other lands, but only to illustrate that the whole idea of regulating ourselves save by ourselves is a matter of but slight, if any, importance.

If we have no advantage over the peoples of the Old World, what, I ask, are we here for, and what brought our ancestors here?

Sir, I hope I am a humanitarian, and do believe in philanthropy, but think that these, like charity, should begin at home.

Because Germany does so and so and England does so and so furnishes no reason to my mind for our doing the same thing. I have yet to learn of any great solicitude on the part of those governments for our happiness and welfare, but I do continually hear men in this country declaiming in one breath about the tottering thrones of Europe and the grandeur of liberty regulated by law here, and in the next insisting that our monetary system must conform to that of the great European powers. This will not do, and for one I say that if we must have an international monetary union, let those powers with tottering thrones conform their monetary system to that of our more stable Government, because, unless our whole scheme of Government is a mistake, it is the perfect one after which those modern offshoots of ancient despotism should copy.
